TRANSLATOR'S PREFACE.

IT is with no ordinary feeling of relief and satisfaction that I am at length able to send forth the second and concluding volume of this Commentary. And I am confident that the trifling delay in this year's issues of the Foreign Theological Library will be readily pardoned, when the tedious toil involved in carrying such a work through the press amidst the pressure of other duties is considered. No pains have been spared to render the work worthy its position ; and the care bestowed upon the work by myself has been fully seconded by the attention of the printers.

The duties of translation have been carefully discharged, and it has been my aim to preserve the complexion of the original as far as possible, even sometimes at the expense of an easy flow of language. Conscious of imperfection in the working out of my design, I have nevertheless sought to put the reader in the position of a student of the original volume. The task which I imposed upon myself has not been confined to mere translation ; but close attention has been given to the accurate reproduction of the critical portions, with the hope of contributing in some small degree to the diffusion of sound exegetical knowledge for the elucidation of one of the grandest and most practical books of the Old Testament Scriptures, and from a conviction of the need there is for the cultivation of the cognate Semitic languages. This latter branch of study is specially applicable and necessary in the interpretation of the book of Job, and the established scholarship of Dr Delitzsch eminently qualifies him for the effective execution of the work.

Further explanation need scarcely be added, except in reference to the retention of the word Chokma, and the character of the translation of the text. As to the former, I regret that I did not append a note to vol. i. p. 5, to the effect that the word Chokma (חֵכְמָה, Wisdom) was reproduced because used technically by the author. I presumed that students of the volume would at once recognise the word; but from the consideration that the Commentary may also be used, so far as the practical parts are concerned, even by readers unacquainted with Hebrew, this explanation has been deemed needful.

And it may further suffice, in connection with the second section of the Introduction, to define Chokma as the one word for the lofty spirit of wisdom which dwelt in the minds of the wise men of Israel in the Salomonic age,—a wisdom taught, inspired, by the Holy Spirit of God—the culmination of which is found in Solomon himself. In brief, the Chokma is the divine philosophy of the Jewish church.

With reference to the new rendering of the text: it aims at a literal and faithful reproduction of Dr Delitzsch's translation, as representing his "sense and appreciation of the original," and as the embodiment of the results of the critical notes. Therefore I have not felt at liberty to use that freedom of expression which I regard as most desirable in adapting the translation of the original text to the requirements of the general reader. This portion of my undertaking has not been free from difficulty; and occasionally an amount of stiffness has seemed unavoidable, owing to the different structure of the Hebrew and English languages, while, from the plastic nature of the German language, the author is enabled to mould his translation closely after the original text, and still render it elegant, and at times rhythmical.

A note on the transcription of Arabic words will be found at the end of the Appendix. The references have been verified, so far as the means of verification have been accessible; and I believe I may speak with confidence of those that I have not been able to verify, from the general accuracy I found in the others.

To clear up the misapprehension which has been manifested in many quarters, I would add that this Commentary forms a part of the Biblical Commentary on the Old Testament by Drs Keil and Delitzsch. But the name of the latter only is appended to these volumes, because Dr Delitzsch is the writer of this portion, just as Dr Keil only is the author of the Commentary on the Pentateuch, and all the other volumes that have appeared to this date.

I have still to acknowledge the kind promptitude with which my esteemed friend Dr Delitzsch has, in more than one instance, given me an explanation of a difficult point, and favoured me with an additional amendment of the original work during the progress of this translation through the press.

In the hope that the usefulness of Dr Delitzsch's valuable contribution to Biblical Exegesis may be extended beyond his original design, I commend it to all earnest students of the Holy Word, with the prayer that the blessing of the Spirit of Jehovah may rest upon the labours of our hands.

ELLAND, November 2, 1866.

NOTE TO SECOND EDITION.

A NEW Edition being required, every advantage has been taken of the opportunity thus afforded of improving this Commentary. During a visit to Germany this summer, the translator went to Leipzig, at Dr. Delitzsch's invitation, for the express purpose of obtaining from the Author his later corrections to "Job." These corrections have been incorporated in the volumes, and the translation has undergone a careful revision.

Dr. Delitzsch has also undertaken to furnish the Publishers with an Appendix to his Commentary, containing the result of more recent work, which he has not at present been able to put into form for publication. When ready, the Publishers will make arrangements by which possessors of this and the first Edition can obtain it in a separate form at a moderate price.

INTRODUCTION TO THE BOOK OF JOB.

JOB, maintaining his virtue, and justifying the utterance of the Creator respecting him, sits upon his heap of ashes as the glory and pride of God. God, and with Him the whole celestial host, witnesses the manner in which he bears his misfortune. He conquers, and his conquest is a triumph beyond the stars. Be it history, be it poetry :
ae who thus wrote was a divine seer.

FRIEDR. HEINR. JACOBI
(Werke, iii. 427).

IN this Introduction but little has been transferred from the Art. Hioð, which the Author has contributed to Herzog's Real-Encyklopädie. It presents a new, independent working up of the introductory matter, and contains only so much of it as is required at the commencement of a Commentary. The Author's treatise on the idea of the book of Job in the Zeitschrift für Protestantismus u. Kirche, 1851, S. 65-85, is recapitulatory rather than isagogic, and consequently of a totally distinct character.

NOTE.

[This work is enriched by critical notes contributed by Prof. Dr Fleischer, and illustrative notes contributed by Dr Wetzstein, fifteen years Prussian Consul at Damascus.

The second volume will contain an Appendix contributed by Dr Wetzstein on the "Monastery of Job" in Hauran, the tradition concerning Job, and a map of the district.—Tr.]

THE BOOK OF JOB.

INTRODUCTION.

§ 1. THE PROBLEM OF THE BOOK OF JOB.

WHY do afflictions upon afflictions befall the righteous man? This is the question, the answering of which is made the theme of the book of Job. Looking to the conclusion of the book, the answer stands: that afflictions are for the righteous man the way to a twofold blessedness. But in itself, this answer cannot satisfy; so much the less, as the twofold blessedness to which Job finally attains is just as earthly and of this world as that which he has lost by affliction. This answer is inadequate, since on the one hand such losses as those of beloved children cannot, as the loss of sheep and camels, really be made good by double the number of other children; on the other hand, it may be objected that many a righteous man deprived of his former prosperity dies in outward poverty. There are numerous deathbeds which protest against this answer. There are many pious sufferers to whom this present material issue of the book of Job could not yield any solace; whom, when in conflict at least, it might the rather bring into danger of despair. With reference to this conclusion, the book of Job is an insufficient theodicy, as in general the truth taught in the Old Testament, that the end, אַחֲרֵית, of the righteous, as of the unrighteous, would reveal the hidden divine recompense, could afford no true consolation so long as this אַחֲרֵית flowed on with death into the night of Hades, שְׁאוֹל, and had no prospect of eternal life.

But the issue of the history, regarded externally, is by no means the proper answer to the great question of the book. The principal thing is not that Job is doubly blessed, but that God acknowledges him as His servant, which He is able to do, after Job in all his afflictions has remained true to God. Therein lies the important truth, that there is a suffering of the righteous which is not a decree of wrath, into which the love of God has been changed, but a dispensation of that love itself. In fact, this truth is the heart of the book of Job. It has therefore been said—particularly by Hirzel, and recently by Renan—that it aims at destroying the old Mosaic doctrine of retribution. But this old Mosaic doctrine of retribution is a modern phantom. That all suffering is a divine retribution, the Mosaic Thora does not teach. Renan calls this doctrine la vieille conception patriarcale. But the patriarchal history, and especially the history of Joseph, gives decided proof against it. The distinction between the suffering of the righteous and the retributive justice of God, brought out in the book of Job, is nothing new. The history before the time of Israel, and the history of Israel even, exhibit it in facts; and the words of the law, as Deut. viii. 16, expressly show that there are sufferings which are the result of God's love; though the book of Job certainly presents this truth, which otherwise had but a scattered and presageful utterance, in a unique manner, and causes it to come forth before us from a calamitous and terrible conflict, as pure gold from a fierce furnace. It comes forth as the result of the controversy with the false doctrine of retribution advanced by the friends; a doctrine which is indeed not Mosaic, for the Mosaic Thora in the whole course of the history of revelation is nowhere impugned and corrected, but ever only augmented, and, consistently with its inherent character, rendered more complete.

But if we now combine both the truths illustrated in the book of Job,—(1) The affliction of the righteous man leads to a so much greater blessedness; (2) The affliction of the righteous is a dispensation of the divine love, which is expressed and verified in the issue of the affliction,—this double answer is still not an adequate solution of the great question of the book. For there ever arises the opposing consideration, wherefore are such afflictions necessary to raise the righteous to blessedness—afflictions which seem so entirely to bear the character of wrath, and are in no way distinguished from judgments of retributive justice?

To this question the book furnishes, as it appears to us, two answers: (1.) The afflictions of the righteous are a means of discipline and purification; they certainly arise from the sins of the righteous man, but still are not the workings of God's wrath, but of His love, which is directed to his purifying and advancement. Such is the view Elihu in the book of Job represents. The writer of the introductory portion of Proverbs has expressed this briefly but beautifully (Prov. iii. 11; cf. Heb. xii.). Oehler, in order that one may perceive its distinction from the view of the three friends, rightly refers to the various theories of punishment. Discipline designed for improvement is properly no punishment, since punishment, according to its true idea, is only satisfaction rendered for the violation of moral order. In how far the speeches of Elihu succeed in conveying this view clear and distinct from the original standpoint of the friends, especially of Eliphaz, matters not to us here; at all events, it is in the mind of the poet as the characteristic of these speeches. (2.) The afflictions of the righteous man are means of proving and testing, which, like chastisements, come from the love of God. Their object is not, however, the purging away of sin which may still cling to the righteous man, but, on the contrary, the manifestation and testing of his righteousness. This is the point of view from which, apart from Elihu's speeches, the book of Job presents Job's afflictions. Only by this relation of things is the chagrin with which Job takes up the words of Eliphaz, and so begins the controversy, explained and justified or excused. And, indeed, if it should be even impossible for the Christian, especially with regard to his own sufferings, to draw the line between disciplinary and testing sufferings so clearly as it is drawn in the book of Job, there is, however, for the deeper and more acute New Testament perception of sin, a suffering of the righteous which exists without any causal connection with his sin, viz. confession by suffering, or martyrdom, which the righteous man undergoes, not for his own sake, but for the sake of God.

If we, then, keep in mind these two further answers which the book of Job gives us to the question, "Why through suffering to blessedness?" it is not to be denied that practically they are perfectly sufficient. If I know that God sends afflictions to me because, since sin and evil are come into the world, they are the indispensable means of purifying and testing me, and by both purifying and testing of perfecting me,—these are explanations with which I can and must console myself. But this is still not the final answer of the book of Job to its great question. And its unparalleled magnitude, its high significance in the historical development of revelation, its typical character already recognised in the Old Testament, consists just in its going beyond this answer, and giving us an answer which, going back to the extreme roots of evil, and being deduced from the most intimate connections of the individual life of man with the history and plan of the world in the most comprehensive sense, not only practically, but speculatively, satisfies.

§ 2. THE CHOKMA-CHARACTER OF THE BOOK.

But before we go so far into this final and highest answer as the province of the Introduction permits and requires, in order to assign to the reader the position necessary to be taken for understanding the book, we ask, How comes it that the book of Job presents such a universal and absolute solution of the problem, otherwise unheard of in the Old Testament Scriptures? The reason of it is in the peculiar mental tendency (Geistesrichtung) of the Israelitish race from which it proceeded. There was in Israel a bias of a universalistic, humanic, philosophical kind, which, starting from the fear or worship (religion) of Jehovah, was turned to the final causes of things,—to the cosmical connections of the earthly, the common human foundations of the Israelitish, the invisible roots of the visible, the universal actual truth of the individual and national historical. The common character of the few works of this Chokma which have been preserved to us is the humanic standpoint, stripped of everything peculiarly Israelitish. In the whole book of Proverbs, which treats of the relations of human life in its most general aspects, the name of the covenant people, יִשְׂרָאֵל, does not once occur. In Ecclesiastes, which treats of the nothingness of all earthly things, and with greater right than the book of Job may be called the canticle of Inquiry,¹ even the covenant name of God, יְהוָה, does not occur. In the Song of Songs, the groundwork of the picture certainly, but not the picture itself, is Israelitish: it represents a common human primary relation, the love of man and woman; and that if not with allegorical, yet mystical meaning, similar to the Indian Gitagovinda, and also the third part of the Tamul Kural, translated by Graul.

So the book of Job treats a fundamental question of our common humanity; and the poet has studiously taken his hero not from Israelitish history, but from extra-Israelitish tradition. From beginning to end he is conscious of relating an extra-Israelitish history,—a history handed down among the Arab tribes to the east of Palestine, which has come to his ears; for none of the proper names contain even a trace of symbolically intended meaning, and romantic historical poems were moreover not common among the ancients. This extra-Israelitish history from the patriarchal period excited the purpose of his poem, because the thought therein presented lay also in his own mind. The Thora from Sinai and prophecy, the history and worship of Israel, are nowhere introduced; even indirect references to them nowhere escape him. He throws himself with wonderful truthfulness, effect, and vividness, into the extra-Israelitish position. His own Israelitish standpoint he certainly does not disavow, as we see from his calling God יהוה everywhere in the prologue and epilogue; but the non-Israelitish character of his hero and of his locality he maintains with strict consistency. Only twice is יהוה found in the mouth of Job (i. 21, xii. 9), which is not to be wondered at, since this name of God, as the names Morija and Jochebed show, is not absolutely post-Mosaic, and therefore may have been known among the Hebrew people beyond Israel. But with this exception, Job and his friends everywhere call God אֱלֹהִים, which is more poetic, and for non-Israelitish speakers (vid. Prov. xxx. 5) more appropriate than אֱלֹהִים, which occurs only three times (xx. 29, xxxii. 2, xxxviii. 7); or they call Him שְׁדַי, which is the proper name of God in the patriarchal time, as it appears everywhere in Genesis, where in the Elohist portions the high and turning-points of the self-manifestation of God occur (xvii. 1, xxxv. 11: cf. Ex.

vi. 3), and when the patriarchs, at special seasons, pronounce the promise which they have received upon their children (xxviii. 3, xlviii. 3, xlix. 25 ; cf. xliii. 14). Even many of the designations of the divine attributes which have become fixed in the Thora, as אֶרֶךְ אַפַּיִם, חֲנוּן, רַחוּם, which one might well expect in the book of Job, are not found in it ; nor מוֹב, often used of Jehovah in Psalms ; nor generally the too (so to speak) dogmatic terminology of the Israelitish religion ;¹ besides which also this characteristic, that only the oldest mode of heathen worship, star-worship (xxxi. 26–28), is mentioned, without even the name of God (אלהים צבאות or יהוה צבאות) occurring, which designates God as Lord of the heavens, which the heathen deified. The writer has also intentionally avoided this name, which is the star of the time of the Israelitish kings ; for he is never unmindful that his subject is an ante- and extra-Israelitish one.

Hengstenberg, in his Lecture on the Book of Job, 1856, goes so far as to maintain, that a character like Job cannot possibly have existed in the heathen world, and that revelation would have been unnecessary if heathendom could produce such characters for itself. The poet, however, without doubt, presupposes the opposite ; and if he did not presuppose it, he should have refrained from using all his skill to produce the appearance of the opposite. That he has nevertheless done it, cannot mislead us : for, on the one hand, Job belongs to the patriarchal period, therefore the period before the giving of the law,—a period in which the primal revelation was still at work, and the revelation of God, which had not remained unknown in the side branches of the patriarchal family. On the other hand, it is quite consistent with the standpoint of the Chokma, that it presupposes a preparatory self-manifestation of God even in the extra-Israelitish world; just as John's Gospel, which aims at proving in Christianity the absolute religion which shall satisfy every longing of all mankind, acknowledges τέκνα τοῦ Θεοῦ διεσκορπισμένα also beyond the people of God, xi. 52, without on this account finding the incarnation of the Logos, and the possibility of regeneration by it, to be superfluous.

This parallel between the book of Job and the Gospel by John is fully authorized; for the important disclosure which the prologue of John gives to us of the Logos, is already in being in the book of Job and the introduction to the book of Proverbs, especially ch. viii., without requiring the intervening element of the Alexandrine religious philosophy, which, however, after it is once there, may not be put aside or disavowed. The Alexandrine doctrine of the Logos is really the genuine more developed form, though with many imperfections, of that which is taught of the Chokma in the book of Job and in Proverbs. Both notions have a universalistic comprehensiveness, referring not only to Israel, but to mankind. The חכמה certainly took up its abode in Israel, as it itself proves in the book Σοφία Σειραχ, ch. xxiv.; but there is also a share of it attainable by and allotted to all mankind. This is the view of the writer of the book of Job. He is imbued with the conviction, that even beyond Israel fellowship is possible with the one living God, who has revealed himself in Israel; that He also there continually reveals himself, ordinarily in the conscience, and extraordinarily in dreams and visions; that there is also found there a longing and struggling after that redemption of which Israel has the clear words of promise. His wondrous book soars high above the Old Testament limit; it is the Melchizedek among the Old Testament books. The final and highest solution of the problem with which it grapples, has a quarry extending out even beyond the patriarchal history. The Wisdom of the book of Job originates, as we shall see, from paradise. For this turning also to the primeval histories of Genesis, which are earlier than the rise of the nations, and the investigation of the hieroglyphs in the prelude to the Thora, which are otherwise almost passed over in the Old Testament, belong to the peculiarities of the Chokma.

§ 3. POSITION IN THE CANON.

As a work of the Chokma, the book of Job stands, with the three other works belonging to this class of the Israelitish literature, among the Hagiographa, which are called in Hebrew simply כְּתוּבִים. Thus, by the side of תּוֹרָה and נְבִיאִים, the third division of the canon is styled, in which are included all those writings belonging neither to the province of prophetic history nor prophetic declaration. Among the Hagiographa are writings even of a prophetic character, as Psalms and Daniel; but their writers were not properly נְבִיאִים. At present Lamentations stands among them; but this is not its original place, as also Ruth appears to have stood originally between Judges and Samuel. Both Lamentations and Ruth are placed among the Hagiographa, that there the five so-called מְגִלּוֹת or scrolls may stand together: Schir ha-Schirim the feast-book of the eighth Passover-day, Ruth that of the second Schabuoth-day, Kinoth that of the ninth of Ab, Koheleth that of the eighth Succoth-day, Esther that of Purim. The book of Job, which is written neither in prophetico-historical style, nor in the style of prophetic preaching, but is a didactic poem, could stand nowhere else but in the third division of the canon. The position which it occupies is moreover a very shifting one. In the Alexandrine canon, Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, Tobit, Judith, Esther, follow the four books of the Kings. The historical books therefore stand, from the earliest to the latest, side by side; then begins with Job, Psalms, Proverbs, a new row, opened with these three in stricter sense poetical books. Then Melito of Sardis, in the second century, places Chronicles with the books of the Kings, but arranges immediately after them the non-historical Hagiographa in the following order: Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Canticles, Job; here the Salomonic writings are joined to the Davidic Psalter, and the anonymous book of Job stands last. In our editions of the Bible, the Hagiographa division begins with Psalms, Proverbs, Job (the succession peculiar to MSS. of the German class); in the Talmud (Bathra, 14*b*), with Ruth, Psalms, Job, Proverbs; in the Masora, and in MSS. of the Spanish class, with Chronicles, Psalms, Job, Proverbs. All these modes of arrangement are well considered. The Masora connects with the נביאים אחרונים the homogeneous book, the Chronicles; the Talmud places the book of Ruth before the Psalter as an historical prologue, or as a connection between the prophetic-historical books and the Hagiographa.¹ The practice in our editions is to put the Psalms as the first book of the division, which agrees with Luke xxiv. 44, and with Philo, who places ὁ μὲν next to the prophetic books. Job stands only in the LXX. at the head of the three so-called poetic books, perhaps as a work by its patriarchal contents referring back to the earliest times. Everywhere else the Psalter stands first among the three books. These three are commonly denoted by the vox memorialis ספרי א"מ; but this succession, Job, Proverbs, Psalms, is nowhere found. The Masora styles them after its own, and the Talmudic order ספרי ת"א.

¹ That Job stands after the Psalms is explained by his being contemporary with the Queen of Sheba, or, accepting Moses as the writer of the book (in which case it should stand at the head of the Chethubim), by its not being placed foremost, on account of its terrible contents (according to the maxim לא מתחילין בפרענותא).

§ 4. THE SYSTEM OF ACCENTUATION, MANNER OF WRITING IN VERSES, AND STRUCTURE OF THE STROPHE.

The so-ciphered three books have, as is known, this in common, that they are (with the exception of the prologue and epilogue in the book of Job) punctuated according to a special system, which has been fully discussed in my Commentary on the Psalms, and in Baer's edition of the Psalter. This accent system, like the prosaic, is constructed on the fundamental law of dichotomy; but it is determined by better organization, more expressive and melodious utterance. Only the so-called prose accents, however, not the metrical or poetic (with the exception of a few detached fragments), have been preserved in transmission. Nevertheless, we are always still able to discern from these accents how the reading in the synagogue divided the thoughts collected into the form of Masoretic verses, into two chief divisions, and within these again into lesser divisions, and connected or separated the single words; while the musical rhythm accommodated itself as much as possible to the logical, so that the accentuation is on this account an important source for ascertaining the traditional exegesis, and contains an abundance of most valuable hints for the interpreter. Tradition, moreover, requires for the three books a verse-like short line stich-manner of writing; and פסע, versus, meant originally, not the Masoretic verse, but the separate sentence, στίχος, denoted in the accent system by a great distinctive; as e.g. Job iii. 3:

*Let the day perish wherein I was born,
And the night, which said, There is a man-child conceived,*

is a Masoretic verse divided into two parts by Athnach, and therefore, according to the old order, is to be written as two στίχοι.¹ This also is important. In order to recognise the strophe-structure of Hebrew poems, one must attend to the στίχοι, in which the poetic thoughts follow one another in well-measured flow. Parallelism, which we must likewise acknowledge as the fundamental law of the rhythm of Hebrew poetry, forms the evolutions of thought not always of two members, but often—as e.g. iii. 4, 5, 6, 9—also of three. The poetic formation is not, however, confined to this, but even further combines (as is most unmistakeably manifest in the alphabetical psalms,² and as recently also Ewald inclines to acknowledge³) such distichs and tristichs into a greater whole, forming a complete circle of thought; in other words, into strophes of four, eight, or some higher number of lines, in themselves paragraphs, which, however, show themselves as strophes, inasmuch as they recur and change symmetrically.

Hupfeld has objected that these strophes, as an aggregate formed of a symmetrical number of stichs, are opposed to the nature of the rhythm = parallelism, which cannot stand on one leg, but needs two; but this objection is as invalid as if one should say, Because every soldier has two legs, therefore soldiers can only march singly, and not in a row and company. It may be seen, e.g., from xxxvi. 22-25, 26-29, 30-33, where the poet begins three times with $\overline{\text{m}}$, and three times the sentences so beginning are formed of eight lines. Shall we not say there are three eight-line strophes beginning with $\overline{\text{m}}$? Nevertheless, we are far from maintaining that the book of Job consists absolutely of speeches in the strophe and poetic form. It breaks up, however, into paragraphs, which not unfrequently become symmetrical strophes. That neither the symmetrical nor mixed strophe-schema is throughout with strict unexceptional regularity carried out, arises from the artistic freedom which the poet was obliged to maintain in order not to sacrifice the truth as well as the beauty of the dialogue. Our translation, arranged in paragraphs, and the schemata of the number of stichs in the paragraph placed above each speech, will show that the arrangement of the whole is, after all, far more strophic than its dramatic character allows, according to classic and modern poetic art.¹ It is similar in Canticles, with the melodramatic character of which it better agrees. In both cases it is explained from the

Hebrew poesy being in its fundamental peculiarity lyric, and from the drama not having freed itself from the lyric element, and attained to complete independence. The book of Job is, moreover, not a drama grown to complete development. Prologue and epilogue are treated as history, and the separate speeches are introduced in the narrative style. In the latter respect (with the exception of ch. ii. 10a), Canticles is more directly dramatic than the book of Job.¹ The drama is here in reference to the strophic form in the garb of song, and in respect of the narrative form in the garb of history or epopee. Also the book of Job cannot be regarded as drama, if we consider, with G. Baur,² dramatic and scenic to be inseparable ideas; for the Jews first became acquainted with the theatre from the Greeks and Romans.³ Nevertheless, it is questionable whether the drama everywhere presupposes the existence of the stage, as e.g. A. W. v. Schlegel, in his Lectures on Dramatic Art and Literature, maintains. Göthe, at least, more than once asserts, that “drama and a composition for the stage may be separate,” and admits a “dramatic plot and execution” in Canticles.⁴

§ 5. THE DRAMATIC ART OF THE PLOT AND EXECUTION.

On the whole, we have as little hesitation as Hupfeld in calling the book of Job a drama; and it is characteristic of the Israelitish Chokma, that by Canticles and the book of Job, its two generic manifestations, it has enriched the national poesy with this new form of poetic composition. The book of Job is, though not altogether, yet substantially, a drama, and one consisting of seven divisions: (1) ch. i.-iii., the opening; (2) ch. iv.-xiv., the first course of the controversy, or the beginning entanglement; (3) ch. xv.-xxi., the second course of the controversy, or the increasing entanglement; (4) ch. xxii.-xxvi., the third course of the controversy, or the increasing entanglement at its highest; (5) ch. xxvii.-xxxi., the transition from the entanglement (δέσις) to the unravelling (λύσις): Job's monologues; (6) ch. xxxviii.-xlii. 6, the unravelment in the consciousness; (7) xlii. 7 sqq., the unraveling in outward reality. In this we have left Elihu's speeches (ch. xxxii.-xxxvii.) out of consideration, because it is very questionable whether they are a part of the original form of the book, and not, on the contrary, the introduction of another poet. If we include them, the drama has eight divisions. The speeches of Elihu form an interlude in the transition from the δέσις to the λύσις. The book of Job is an audience-chamber, and one can readily suppose that a cotemporary or later poet may have mixed himself up with the speakers. Whether, however, this is really the case, may remain here undecided. The prologue is narrative, but still partly in dialogue style, and so far not altogether undramatical. In form it corresponds most to the Euripidean, which also are a kind of epic introduction to the pieces, and it accomplishes what Sophocles in his prologues so thoroughly understands. At the very beginning he excites interest in the occurrences to be brought forward, and makes us acquainted with that which remains concealed from the actors. After the knot of the puzzle is tied in the prologue, it becomes more and more deeply entangled in the three courses of the controversy. In the monologues of Job it begins to be disentangled, and in the sixth part the unravelling follows, well prepared for, and therefore not ἀπὸ μηχανῆς, and is perfected in the epilogue or exodus: the servant of God, being so far as necessary cleared by penitence, is justified in opposition to his friends; and the victor, tried in accordance with the divine utterance, is crowned. It is therefore a continually progressing history. The remark of Herder,¹ "Here all is stationary in long conversations," is superficial. It is from beginning to end a stream of the most active life, with external incident only in the opening and in the unravelling; what Schlegel says of Göthe's Iphigenie holds good of the middle of the book, that the ideas are worked into incidents, and brought, as it were, before the eye. Moreover, as in Göthe's Tasso, the deficiency of external action is compensated by the richness and precision with which the characters are drawn. Satan, Job's wife, the hero himself, the three friends,—everywhere diversified and minute description. The poet manifests, also, dramatic skill in other directions. He has laid out the controversy with a masterly hand, making the heart of the reader gradually averse to the friends, and in the same degree winning it towards Job. He makes the friends all through give utterance to the most glorious truths, which, however, in the application to the case before them, turn out to be untrue. And although the whole of the representation serves one great idea, it is still not represented by any of the persons brought forward, and is by no one expressly uttered. Every person is, as it were, the consonant letter to the word of this idea; it is throughout the whole book taken up with the realization of itself; at the end it first comes forth as the resulting product of the whole. Job himself is not less a tragic hero than the Œdipus of both Sophocles' tragedies.² What is there an inevitable fate, expressed by the oracle, is in the book of Job the decree of Jehovah, over whom is no controlling power, decreed in the assembly of angels. As a painful puzzle the lot of affliction comes down on Job. At the beginning he is the victor of an easy battle, until the friends' exhortations to repentance are added to suffering, which in itself is incomprehensible, and make it still harder to be understood. He is thereby involved in a hard conflict, in which at one time, full of arrogant self-confidence, he exalts himself heavenward; at another time, sinks to the ground in desponding sadness.

The God, however, against which he fights is but a phantom, which the temptation has presented to his saddened eye instead of the true God; and this phantom is in no way different from the inexorable fate of the Greek tragedy. As in that the hero seeks to maintain his inward freedom against the secret power which crushes him with an iron arm; so Job maintains his innocence against this God, which has devoted him to destruction as an offender. But in the midst of this terrific conflict with the God of the present, this creation of the temptation, Job's faith gropes after the God of the future, to whom he is ever driven nearer the more mercilessly the enemies pursue him. At length Jehovah really appears, but not at Job's impetuous summons. He appears first after Job has made a beginning of humble self-concession, in order to complete the work begun, by condescendingly going forth to meet him. Jehovah appears, and the fury vanishes. The dualism, which the Greek tragedy leaves unabolished, is here reconciled. Human freedom does not succumb; but it be-animositatem horum affectuum infinitum quantum subsidet. Similarly Ewald (Jahrb. ix. 27): Neither the Hindoos, nor the Greeks and Romans, have such a lofty and purely perfected poem to produce. One would perhaps compare it with one of Æschylus or Sophocles' tragedies as the nearest; but we cannot easily find a single one among these approaching its unblemished height and perfection in the midst of the greatest simplicity.

comes evident that not an absolute arbitrary power, but divine wisdom, whose inmost impulse is love, moulds human destiny.

§ 6. TIME OF COMPOSITION.

That this masterpiece of religious reflection and systematic creative art—this, to use Luther's expression, lofty and grand book, in which, as the mountains round an Alpine valley, all the terribly sublime that nature and human history present is ranged one above another—belongs to no other than the Salomonic period, we might almost assume, even if it were not confirmed on all sides. The opinion that Moses wrote the book of Job before the giving of the law, is found in the Talmuds (jer. Sota V. 8; b. Bathra, 15a). This view has been recently revived by Ebrard (1858). But how improbable, all but impossible, that the poetical literature of Israel should have taken its rise with such a non plus ultra of reflective poetry, and that this poem should have had Moses the lawgiver for its author! "Moses certainly is not the composer of the book of Job," says Herder rightly,¹ "or Solon might have written the Iliad and the Eumenides of Æschylus." This opinion, which is also found in Origen, Jerome, Polychronius, and Julian of Halicarnassus, would surely never have suggested itself to any one, had not the studious avoidance in the book of all reference to the law, prophecy, history, religious worship, and even of the religious terminology of Israel, consequent on its design, produced the appearance of a pre-Sinaitic origin. But, first, this absence of such reference is, as we have already seen, the result of the genius and aim which belong to the book; secondly, the writer distinctly enough betrays his acquaintance with the Thora: for as the Chokma for the most part necessarily presupposes the revelation of God deposited in the Thora,

and is even at pains to show its universal and eternal ideas, and its imperishable nature full of meaning for all men, so a book like the book of Job could only have been written by an Israelitish author, only have sprung from the spiritual knowledge and experience rendered possible by the Thora.¹ For as insight into the groping of the heathen world after divine truth is only possible in the light of Christianity, so also such a spiritually bold and accurate reproduction of an old patriarchal tradition was only possible in the light of the revelation of Jehovah: not to mention that the middle part of the book is written in the style of the book of Proverbs, the surrounding parts in evident imitation of the style of the primitive histories of the Pentateuch.

But as the supposition of a pre-Salomonic composition is proved invalid, so also are all the grounds on which it has been sought to prove a post-Salomonic. Ewald, whom Heiligstedt and Renan follow, is of opinion that it shows very unsettled and unfortunate times in the background, and from this and other indications was written under Manasseh; Hirzel, that the writer who is so well acquainted with Egypt, seems to have been carried into Egypt with King Jehoahaz; Stickel, that the book presupposes the invasion of the Asiatic conqueror as begun, but not yet so far advanced as the destruction of Jerusalem; Bleek, that it must belong to the post-Salomonic period, because it seems to refer to a previous comprehensive diversified literature. But all this rests on invalid grounds, false observation, and deceptive conclusions. Indeed, the assumption that a book which sets forth such a fearful conflict in the depths of affliction must have sprung from a time of gloomy national distress, is untenable: it is sufficient to suppose that the writer himself has experienced the like, and experienced it at a time when all around him were living in great luxury, which must have greatly aggravated his trial. It would be preferable to suppose that the book of Job belongs to the time of the exile (Umbreit and others), and that Job, though not exactly a personification of Israel, is still מִשַׁל לְיִשְׂרָאֵל,¹ a pattern for the people of the exile (Bernstein); for this view, interesting indeed in itself, has the similarity of several passages of the second part of the book of Isaiah in its favour: comp. ch. xl. 14 with Job xxi. 22, xl. 23 with Job xii. 24, xliv. 25 with Job xii. 17, 20, xliv. 24 with Job ix. 8, lix. 4 with Job xv. 35, Ps. vii. 15. These, however, only prove that the severely tried ecclesia pressa of the exiles might certainly recognise itself again in the example of Job, and make it seem far more probable that the book of Job is older than that period of Israel's suffering.

The literature of the Chokma began with Solomon. First in the time of Solomon, whose peculiar gift was worldly wisdom, a time which bears the character of peaceful contemplation resulting from the conflicts of belief of David's time,² the external and internal preliminary conditions for it existed. The chief part of Proverbs and Canticles are by Solomon himself; the introductory passages (Prov. i.-ix.) represent a later period of the Chokma, probably the time of Jehoshaphat; the book of Ecclesiastes, which is rightly assigned by H. G. Bernstein in his Questiones Kohelethanæ to the time between Artaxerxes I. Longimanus, and Darius Codomannus, and perhaps belongs to the time of Artaxerxes II. Mnemon, represents the latest period. The book of Job is indicated as a work of the first of these three periods, by its classic, grand, and noble form. It bears throughout the stamp of that creative, beginning-period of the Chokma,—of that Salomonic age of knowledge and art, of deeper thought respecting revealed religion, and of intelligent, progressive culture of the traditional forms of art,—that unprecedented age, in which the literature corresponded to the summit of glorious magnificence to which the kingdom of the promise had then attained. The heart of Solomon (according to 1 Kings v. 9 sq., Heb.; iv. 29, English version) enclosed within itself a fulness of knowledge, “even as the sand that is on the sea-shore:” his wisdom exceeded that of the בני קדם, from whom the traditional matter of the book of Job is borrowed; exceeded also the wisdom of the מצרים, with whose country and natural marvels the author of the book of Job is intimately acquainted. The extensive knowledge of natural history and general science displayed in the book of Job, is the result of the wide circle of observation which Israel had reached in the time of Solomon. It was a time when the chasm between Israel and the nations was more than ever bridged over. The entire education of Israel at that time took a so to speak cosmopolitan direction. It was a time introductory to the extension of redemption, and the triumph of the religion of Israel, and the union of all nations in belief on the God of love.

² Thus far Gaupp, Praktische Theol. ii. 1, 488, is in some degree right, when he considers the book of Job a living testimony of the new spirit of belief which was bursting forth in David's time.

§ 7. SIGNS FROM THE DOCTRINAL CONTENTS.

That the book of Job belongs to this period and no other, is confirmed also by the relation of its doctrinal contents to the other canonical writings. If we compare the doctrine respecting Wisdom—her super-eminence, applicability to worldly matters, and co-operation in the creation of the world—in Prov. i.-ix., especially ch. viii., with Job xxviii., it is there manifestly more advanced, and further developed. If we compare the pointing to the judgment of God, Job xix. 29, with the hint of a future general judgment, which shall decide and adjust all things, in Eccl. xii. 14, we see at once that what comes forward in the former passage only at first as an expression of personal belief, is in the latter already become a settled element of general religious consciousness.

And however we may interpret that brilliant passage of the book of Job, ch. xix. 25-27,—whether it be the beholding of God in the present bodily, future spiritual, or future glorified state,—it is by no means an echo of an already existing revelation of the resurrection of the dead, that acknowledgment of revelation which we see breaking forth and expanding throughout Isa. xxvi. 19, comp. xxv. 8, and Ezek. xxxvii. comp. Hos. vi. 2, until Dan. xii. 2. The prevailing representations of the future in the book of Job are exactly the same as those in the Psalms of the time of David and Solomon, and in the Proverbs of Solomon. The writer speaks as one of the same age in which Heman sighed, Ps. lxxxviii. 11 sq., “Wilt Thou show wonders to the dead? or shall the shades arise and praise Thee? Shall Thy loving-kindness be declared in the grave, Thy faithfulness in the abyss?” Besides, the greatest conceivable fulness of allusion to the book of Job, including Elihu’s speeches, is found in Ps. lxxxviii. and lxxxix., whose authors, Heman and Ethan, the Ezrahites, are not the same as the chief singers of David of the same name, but the contemporaries of Solomon mentioned in 1 Kings v. 11. These two psalms coincide with the book of Job, both in expressions with which remarkable representations are united, as קְרוּשִׁים of the celestial spirits, רַפָּאִים of the shades in Hades, אַבְרוֹן of Hades itself, and also in expressions which do not occur elsewhere in the Old Testament, as אֱמִים and בְּעֵתִים; and the agreement is manifest, moreover, in the agreement of whole verses either in thought or in expression: comp. Ps. lxxxix. 38 with Job xvi. 19, lxxxix. 48 with Job vii. 7, lxxxix. 49 with Job xiv. 14, lxxxviii. 5 with Job xiv. 10, lxxxviii. 9 with Job xxx. 10, lxxxix. 8 with Job xxxi. 34. In all these passages, however, there is no such similarity as suggests a borrowing, but an agreement which, since it cannot possibly be accidental, may be most easily explained by supposing that the book of Job proceeds from just the same Chokma-fellowship to which, according to 1 Kings v. 11, the two Ezrahites, the writers of Ps. lxxxviii. and lxxxix., belong.

One might go further, and conjecture that the same Heman who composed Ps. lxxxviii., the gloomiest of all the Psalms, and written under circumstances of suffering similar to Job's, may be the author of the book of Job—for which many probable reasons might be advanced; by which also what G. Baur rightly assumes would be confirmed, that the writer of the book of Job has himself passed through the inward spiritual conflict which he describes, and accordingly gives a page from his own religious history. But we are satisfied with the result, that the book of Job is the work of one of the wise men whose rendezvous was the court of Solomon. Gregory of Nazianza and Luther have already admitted the origin of the book in Solomon's time; and among later critics, Rosenmüller, Hävernicks, Vaihinger, Hahn, Schlottmann, Keil, and Hofmann (though in his Weissagung und Erfüllung he expressed the opinion that it belongs to the Mosaic period), are agreed in this ¹

§ 8. ECHOES IN THE LATER SACRED WRITINGS.

It may be readily supposed, that a book like this, which is occupied with a question of such vital import to every thinking and pious man,—which treats it in such a lively manner, riveting the attention, and bespeaking sympathy,—which, apart from its central subject, is so many-sided, so majestically beautiful in language, and so inexhaustible in imagery,—will have been one of the most generally read of the national books of Israel. Such is found to be the case; and also hereby its origin in the time of Solomon is confirmed: for at this very period it is to Ps. lxxxviii. lxxxix. only that it stands in the mutual relation already mentioned. But the echoes appear as early as in the דברי חכמים, which are appended to the Salomonic משלי in the book of Proverbs: comp. the teaching from an example in the writer's own experience, Prov. xxiv. 30 sqq. with Job v. 3 sqq. The book of Job, however, next to the Proverbs of Solomon, was the favourite source of information for the author of the introductory proverbs (ch. i.–ix.). Here (apart from the doctrine of wisdom) we find whole passages similar to the book of Job: comp. Prov. iii. 11 with Job v. 17, viii. 25 with Job xv. 7, iii. 15 with Job xxviii. 18.

Then, in the prophets of the flourishing period of prophetic literature, which begins with Obadiah and Joel, we find distinct traces of familiarity with the book of Job. Amos describes the glory of God the Creator in words taken from it (ch. iv. 13, v. 8, after Job ix. 8; cf. x. 22, xxxviii. 31). Isaiah has introduced a whole verse of the book of Job, almost verbatim, into his prophecy against Egypt (ch. xix. 5 = Job xiv. 11): in the same prophecy, ch. xix. 13 sq. refer to Job xii. 24 sq., so also ch. xxxv. 3 to Job iv. 4. These reminiscences of the book of Job are frequent in Isaiah (ch. xl.–lxvi.). This book of solace for the exiles corresponds to the book of Job not only in words, which exclusively belong in common to the two (as נָיִץ and צָחָצְחִים), and in surprising similarity of expression (as ch. liii. 9, comp. Job xvi. 17; lx. 6, comp. Job xxii. 11), but also in numerous passages of similar thought and form (comp. ch. xl. 23 with Job xii. 24); and in the description of the Servant of Jehovah, one is here and there involuntarily reminded of the book of Job (as ch. l. 6, comp. with Job xvi. 10). In Jeremiah, the short lyric passage, ch. xx. 14–18, in which he curses the day of his birth, falls back on Job iii.: the form in which the despondency of the prophet breaks forth is determined by the book of Job, with which he was familiar. It requires no proof that the same prophet follows the book of Job in many passages of Lamentations, and especially the first part of ch. iii.: he makes use of confessions, complaints, and imagery from the affliction of Job, to represent the affliction of Israel.

By the end of the time of the kings, Job was a person generally known in Israel, a recognised saint; for Ezekiel, in the year 593–2 B.C. (ch. xiv. 14 sqq.), complains that the measure of Israel's sin is so great, that if Noah, Daniel, and Job were in the midst of Israel, though they might save themselves, they would not be able to hold back the arm of divine justice. The prophet mentions first Noah, a righteous man of the old world; then Daniel, a righteous man of contemporary Israel; and last of all Job, a righteous man beyond the line of the promise.¹ He would not, however, have been able to mention him, if he had not, by means of the written narrative, been a person well known among the people to whom the prophetic discourse was addressed. The literature of the Old Testament has no further references to the question of the time of the composition of the book of Job; for, on a comparison of Eccl. v. 14 with Job i. 21, it scarcely remains a question to which the priority belongs.

§ 9. THE CHIEF CRITICAL QUESTIONS.

Whether, however, the whole book, as we now have it, comes from the time of Solomon, as the work of one poet, or of one chief poet,¹ is a question which can be better determined in the course of the exposition. More or less important doubts have been entertained whether some constituent parts of the whole belong to the original setting. By far the most important question of criticism respects the six chapters of Elihu's speeches (ch. xxxii.-xxxvii.), respecting which the suspicion entertained by the fathers, and first decidedly expressed by Stuhlmann (1804), that not only in form are they inferior to the artistic execution of the rest of the work, but also in contents are opposed to its original plan, is not yet set aside, and perhaps never will be altogether satisfactorily settled. Besides this, Kennicot also has suspected the speech of Job, ch. xxvii. 11-xxviii. 28, because there Job seems to yield to the friends' controverted doctrine of retribution. De Wette is more inclined here to suppose a want of connection on the in ll. poet. p. 35) is more ingenious, but too artificial, when he finds an anti-climax in the order: Noachus in clade primi mundi æcumenica, Daniel in clade patriæ ac gentis suæ, Iobus in clade familiæ servatus est.

part of the writer than an interpolation. We shall have to prove whether this speech of Job really encroaches upon the province of the unravelling, or renders the transition more complete.

The whole description of Behemoth and Leviathan, ch. xl. 15-xli. 26, is regarded by Ewald as a later addition : De Wette extends this judgment only to ch. xli. 4-26 : Eichhorn was satisfied at first with changing the order of Jehovah's speeches ; but in the last edition of his Einleitung ascribed the passage about the two monsters to a later poet. The exposition will have to bring the form of expression of the supposed interpolation, and its relation to the purpose of the second speech of Jehovah, in comparison with the first, under consideration. But we need not defer our judgment of the prologue and epilogue. All the doubts raised by Stuhlmann, Bernstein, Knobel (diss. de carminis Iobi argumento, fine ac dispositione, and Studien u. Kritiken, 1842, ii.), and others, respecting both these essential parts, are put an end to by the consideration, that the middle part of the book, without them, is a torso without head and feet.

§ 10. THE SATAN OF THE PROLOGUE.

But the Satan in the prologue is a stumbling-block to many, which, if it does not lead them to doubt the authenticity of the prologue, still causes them to question whether the composition of the book belongs to the time of Solomon. For Satan is first definitely named, Zech. iii., and 1 Chron. xxi. 1 ; consequently in writings of the period after the exile. On the other hand, שָׂטָן, Num. xxii. 22, appellatively describes one who comes forward hostilely, or as a hindrance ; and Ps. cix. 6 is at least open to question whether the prince of evil spirits may not be meant, which, according to Zech. iii. 1, seems to be intended. However, in Micaiah's vision, 1 Kings xxii. 19-23, where one might expect השטן, הרוח is used. It is even maintained in the present day, that the idea of Satan was first obtained by the Israelitish race from contact with the East-Asiatic nations, which began with Israel in the time of Menahem, with Judah in the time of Ahaz; the view of Diestel, that it is the copy of the Egyptian Set-Typhon, stands at present alone. When we consider that the redemptive work of Jesus Christ is regarded by Him and His apostles from one side as the overthrow of Satan, it were a miserable thing for the divine truth of Christianity that this Satan should be nothing more than a copy of the Persian Ahriman, and consequently a mere phantom. However, supposing there were some such connection, we should then have only two periods at which the book of Job could possibly have been composed,—the time after the exile, and the time of Solomon; for these are the only periods at which not only collision, but also an interchange of ideas, between Israel and the profane nations could have taken place. It is also just as possible for the conception of Satan to have taken possession of the Israelitish mind under Solomon as during the exile, especially as it is very questionable whether the religion of Cyrus, as found in the Zend books, may not have been far more influenced by Israel, than, contrariwise, have influenced Israel.

But the conception of Satan is indeed much older in its existence than the time of Solomon: the serpent of paradise must surely have appeared to the inquiring mind of Israel as the disguise of an evil spirit; and nothing further can be maintained, than that this evil spirit, which in the Mosaic rite of the great day of atonement is called עִזְזָאֵל (called later בעל זבוב, a name borrowed from the god of Ekron), appears first in the later literature of Israel under the name השטן. If now, moreover, the Chokma of the Salomonic period was specially conversant with the pre-Israelitish histories of Genesis, whence indeed even the chief thought of Canticles and the figure of עץ חיים e.g. frequently occurring in Proverbs are drawn, it is difficult to conceive why the evil spirit, that in its guise of a serpent aimed its malice against man, could not have been called השטן so early as the Salomonic period.

The wisdom of the author of the book of Job, we have said above, springs from paradise. Thence he obtains the highest and final solution of his problem. It is now time to give expression to this. At present we need only do so in outline, since it is simply of use to place us from the commencement at the right standpoint for understanding the book of Job.

§ 11. THE FINAL SOLUTION OF THE PROBLEM.

The nature of sin is two-sided. It consists in the creature's setting up himself in opposition to God, who is the essence of the personality of the creature. It consists also, on the other side, in the stirring up of the depth of the nature of the creature, whose essential consistence has its harmony in God; and by this stirring up, falls into a wild confusion. In other words, evil has a personal side and a natural side. And just so, also, is God's wrath which it excites, and which operates against it. For God's wrath is, on the one hand, the personal displeasure or aversion into which His love is changed, since the will of the creature and the will of God are in opposition; on the other hand, an excited condition of the contrary forces of the divine nature, or, as Scripture expresses it, the kindling of the fire of the divine glory, in which sense it is often said of wrath, that God sends it forth, that He pours it forth, and that man has to drink of it (Job xxi. 20, comp. vi. 4).¹

In reference to the creature, we call evil according to its personal side ἐχθρα, and according to its natural side ἀταξία, turba.¹ Both personal evil and natural evil have originated in the spirit world: first of all, in a spirit nearest to God, which as fallen is called שטן. It has sought its own selfish ends, and thereby deranged its nature, so that it has become in every respect the object of the divine wrath, and the material for the burning of the divine wrath: for the echthra and turba have the intention and the burning of the wrath of God in themselves as divine correlata; but Satan, after that he has become entirely possessed of these divine powers (Energien), is also their instrument. The spirit of light and love is altogether become the spirit of fire and wrath; the whole sphere of wrath is centred in him. After having given up his high position in the realm of light, he is become lord of the realm of wrath.

He has, from the commencement of his fall, the hell within himself, but is first cast into the lake of fire at the end of the present dispensation (Matt. xxv. 41; Apoc. xx. 10: comp. Dan. vii. 11). In the meantime, he is being deprived of his power by the Son of man, who, in the midst of His own and His disciples' victories over the demons, beholds him fall as lightning from heaven (Luke x. 18), and by His death gives him his deathblow,—a final judgment, which, later on, becomes fully manifest in the continuous degradation of the vanquished (comp. Apoc. xii. 9, xx. 3, xx. 10). Accordingly, when Satan, in the book of Job, still appears among the angels of God in heaven, and indeed as κατήγωρ, it is quite in accordance with the disclosures which the New Testament Scriptures give us respecting the invisible angelic side of the present dispensation.

We will now cast a glance at the relation to the wrath of God, and to Satan, into which man has fallen through the temptation of the old serpent. Tempted by Satan, he is himself fallen into the realm of wrath, and become a servant of

Satan. He is in his grasp. All calamity that befalls him is divine punishment, either proceeding directly from the wrath of God, or worked by the wrath-spirit, Satan. But in prospect of the future atonement, which was to free man from the wrath of God, and from the power of wrath in which Satan holds him, it was possible for man, even under the Old Testament, to realize this deliverance, by virtue of an apprehension of the grace flowing from God's purpose of redemption. Whoever has been made free by this grace is changed from an object of the divine wrath to an object of the divine love, and nothing that befalls him in this condition proceeds from the wrath of God—all from His love. This love cannot, however, manifest itself so brightly as it would, so long as sin remains in the man and in the world; it is only able to manifest itself as loving wrath, i.e. as love controlling, and making wrath serviceable to itself.

Thus Job's suffering is a dispensation of love, but brought about by the wrath-spirit, and with every appearance of wrath. It is so with every trial and chastisement of the righteous. And it cannot be otherwise; for trial is designed to be for man a means of overcoming the evil that is external to him, and chastisement of overcoming the evil that is within him. There is a conflict between evil and good in the world, which can issue in victory to the good only so, that the good proves itself in distinction from the evil, withstands the assault of evil, and destroys the evil that exists bound up with itself: only so, that the good as far as it is still mixed with the evil is refined as by fire, and more and more freed from it.

This is the twofold point of view from which the suffering of Job is to be regarded. It was designed, first of all, that Job should prove himself in opposition to Satan, in order to overcome him; and since Job does not pass through the trial entirely without sinning, it has the effect at the same time of purifying and perfecting him. In both respects, the history of Job is a passage from the history of God's own conflict with the evil one, which is the substance of the history of redemption, and ends in the triumph of the divine love. And Gaupp¹ well says: In the book of Job, Satan loses a cause which is intended only as prelude to the greatest of all causes, since judgment is gone forth over the world, and the prince of darkness has been cast forth. Accordingly the church has always recognised in the passion of Job a type of the passion of Jesus Christ. James (v. 11) even compares the patience of Job and the issue of the Lord's sufferings. And according to this indication, it was the custom after the second century to read the book of Job in the churches during passion-week.² The final solution of the problem which this marvellous book sets forth, is then this: the suffering of the righteous, in its deepest cause, is the conflict of the seed of the woman with the seed of the serpent, which ends in the head of the serpent being trampled under foot; it is the type or copy of the suffering of Christ, the Holy God, who has himself borne our sins, and in the constancy of His reconciling love has withstood, even to the final overthrow, the assault of wrath and of the angel of wrath.

The real contents of the book of Job is the mystery of the Cross: the Cross on Golgotha is the solution of the enigma of every cross; and the book of Job is a prophecy of this final solution.

§ 12. THE HISTORY OF THE EXPOSITION.

Before proceeding to the exposition, we will take a brief review of the history of the exposition of the book. The promise of the Spirit to lead into all truth is continually receiving its fulfilment in the history of the church, and especially in the interpretation of Scripture. But nowhere is the progress of the church in accordance with this promise so manifest as in the exposition of the word, and particularly of the Old Testament. In the patristic and middle ages, light was thrown only on detached portions of the Old Testament; they lacked altogether, or had but an inadequate knowledge of, the Hebrew language. They regarded the Old Testament not as the forerunner, but allegory, of the New, and paid less attention to it in proportion as the spiritual perception of the church lost its apostolic purity and freshness. However, so far as inward spiritual feeling and experience could compensate for the almost entire absence of outward conditions, this period has produced and handed down many valuable explanations.

But at the time of the Reformation, the light of the day which had already dawned first spread in all its brightness over the Old Testament. The knowledge of Hebrew, until then the private possession of a few, became the public property of the church: all erroneous interventions which had hitherto separated the church both from Christ and from the living source of the word were put aside; and starting from the central truth of justification by faith and its results, a free but still not unrestricted investigation commenced. Still there was wanting to this period all perception of historical development, and consequently the ability to comprehend the Old Testament as preparing the way for the New by its gradual historical development of the plan of redemption. The exposition of Scripture, moreover, soon fell again under the yoke of an enslaving tradition, of a scholastic systematizing, and of an unhistorical dogmatizing which mistook its peculiar aim ; and this period of bondage, devoid of spirituality, was followed by a period of false freedom, that of rationalism, which cut asunder the mutual relation between the exposition of Scripture and the confession of the church, since it reduced the covenant contents of the church's confession to the most shallow notion of God and the most trivial moral rules, and regarded the Old Testament as historical indeed, but with carnal eyes, which were blind to the work of God that was preparing the way in the history of Israel for the New Testament redemption. The progress of exegesis seemed at that time to have been stayed ; but the Head of the church, who reigns in the midst of His enemies, caused the exposition of His word to come forth again from the dead in a more glorious form. The bias towards the human side of Scripture has taught exegesis that Scripture is neither altogether a divine, nor altogether a human, but a divine-human book. The historical method of regarding it, and the advanced knowledge of language, have taught that the Old Testament presents a divine-human growth tending towards the God-man, a gradual development and declaration of the divine purpose of salvation,—a miraculous history moving onward towards that miracle of all miracles, Jesus Christ. Believing on Him, bearing the seal of His Spirit in himself, and partaking of the true liberty His Spirit imparts, the expositor of Scripture beholds in the Old Testament, with open face, now as never before, the glory of the Lord.

The truth of this sketch is confirmed by the history of the exposition of the book of Job. The Greek fathers, of whom twenty-two (including Ephrem) are quoted in the Catena,¹ published by Patricius Junius, 1637, furnish little more than could be expected. If there be any Old Testament book whose comprehensive meaning is now first understood according to the external and internal conditions of its gradual advance to maturity, it is the book of Job. The Greek fathers were confined to the LXX., without being in a position to test that translation by the original text; and it is just the Greek translation of the book of Job which suffers most seriously from the flaws which in general affect the LXX. Whole verses are omitted, others are removed from their original places, and the omissions are filled up by apocryphal additions.¹ Origen was well aware of this (Ep. ad Afric. § 3 sq.), but he was not sufficiently acquainted with Hebrew to give a reliable collation of the LXX. with the original text in his Tetrapla and Hexapla; and his additions (denoted by daggers), and the passages restored by him from other translators, especially Theodotion (by asterisks), deprive the Septuagint text of its original form, without, however, giving a correct impression of the original text. And since in the book of Job the meaning of the whole is dependent upon the meaning of the most isolated passage, the full meaning of the book was a perfect impossibility to the Greek fathers. They occupied themselves much with this mysterious book, but typical and allegorical could not make up what was wanting to the fathers, of grammatical and historical interpretation. The Italic, the next version to the LXX., was still more defective than this: Jerome calls the book of Job in this translation, Decurtatus et laceratus corrosusque. He revised it by the text of the Hexapla, and according to his own plan had to supply not less than about 700–800 versus (στίχοι). His own independent translation is far before its age; but he himself acknowledges its defectiveness, inasmuch as he relates, in his præfatio in l. Iob, how it was accomplished. He engaged, non parvis numis, a Jewish teacher from Lydda, where there was at that time an university, but confesses that, after he had gone through the book of Job with him, he was no wiser than before : Cujus doctrina an aliquid profecerim nescio; hoc unum scio, non potuisse me interpretari nisi quod antea intellexeram. On this account he calls it, as though he would complain of the book itself, obliquus, figuratus, lubricus, and says it is like an eel—the more tightly one holds it, the faster it glides away. There were then three Latin versions of the book of Job,—the Italic, the Italic improved by Jerome, and the independent translation of Jerome, whose deviations, as Augustine complains, produced no little embarrassment. The Syrians were better off with their Peschito, which was made direct from the original text;¹ but the Scholia of Ephrem (pp. 1–19, t. ii. of the three Syriac tomi of his works) contain less that is useful than might be expected.² The succeeding age produced nothing better.

Among the expositors of the book of Job we find some illustrious names : Gregory the Great, Beda Venerabilis (whose Commentary has been erroneously circulated as the still undiscovered Commentary of Jerome), Thomas Aquinas, Albertus Magnus,³ and others ; but no progress was made in the interpretation of the book, as the means were wanting. The principal work of the middle ages was Gregory the Great's Expositio in beatum Iob seu Moraliū, ll. xxxv., a gigantic work, which leaves scarcely a dogmatic-ethical theme untouched, though in its own proper sphere it furnishes nothing of importance, for Gregory explained so, ut super historię fundamentum moralitatis construeret ædificium et analoges imposuerit culmen præstantissimum,¹ but the linguistic-historical foundation is insufficient, and the exposition, which gives evidence of significant character and talent, accordingly goes off almost constantly into digressions opposed to its object.

It was only towards the end of the middle ages, as the knowledge of the Hebrew language began, through Jewish converts, to come into the church, that a new era commenced. For what advance the Jewish exposition of the book of Job had hitherto made, beyond that of the church, it owed to the knowledge of Hebrew; although, in the absence of any conception of the task of the expositor, and especially the expositor of Scripture, it knew not how fittingly to turn it to account. Saadia's (born 890) Arabic translation of the book of Job, with explanations,² does not accomplish much more than that of Jerome, if we may in general say that it surpasses it. Salomo Isaaki of Troyes (Raschi, erroneously called Jarchi), whose Commentary on the Book of Job (rendered incomplete by his death, 1105) was completed by his grandson, Samuel b. Meïr (Raschbam, died about 1160),³ contains a few attempts at grammatical historical exposition, but is in other respects entirely dependent on Midrash Haggada (which may be compared with the church system of allegorical interpretation), whose barren material is treasured up in the catena-like compilations, one of which to the collected books of the Old Testament bears the name of Simeon ha-Darschan (ילקוט שמעוני); the other to the three poetical books, the name of Machir b. Todros (ילקוט מבירי). Abenezra the Spaniard, who wrote his Commentary on the Book of Job in Rome, 1175, delights in new bold ideas, and to enshroud himself in a mystifying nimbus. David Kimchi, who keeps best to the grammatico-historical course, has not expounded the book of Job; and a commentary on this book by his brother, Mose Kimchi, is not yet brought to light. The most important Jewish works on the book of Job are without doubt the Commentaries of Mose b. Nachman or Nachmanides (Ramban), born at Gerona 1194, and Levi b. Gerson, or Gersonides (Ralbag), born at Bagnols 1288. Both were talented thinkers; the former more of the Platonic, the latter of the Aristotelic type. Their Commentaries (taken up in the collective Rabbinical Commentaries), especially that of the latter, were widely circulated in the middle ages. They have both a philosophical bias.¹ What is to be found in them that is serviceable on any point, may be pretty well determined from the compilation of Lyra. Nikolaus de Lyra, author of Postillæ perpetuæ in universa Biblia (completed 1330), possessed, for that age, an excellent knowledge of the original text, the necessity of which he acknowledged, and regarded the sensus literalis as basis of all other sensus. But, on the one hand, he was not independent of his Jewish predecessors; on the other, he was fettered by the servile unevangelical ecclesiasticism of his age.

The bursting of this fetter was the dawn of a new day for exegesis. Luther, Brentius, and other reformers, by the depth of their religious experience, their aversion to the capriciousness of the system of allegorical interpretation and freedom from tradition, were fitted to look into the very heart of the book of Job; and they also possessed sufficient acquaintance with the Hebrew to get an inkling of the carrying out of its chief idea, but no more than an inkling of it. "The book of Job," says Luther in his preface, "treats of the question whether misfortune from God befalls even the godly. Here Job is firm, and maintains that God afflicts even the godly without cause, for His praise alone, as Christ (John ix.) also shows from the man who was born blind." In these words the idea of the book is correctly indicated. But that he had only an approximate conception of the separate parts, he openly confesses. By the help of Melancthon and the Hebraist Aurogallus, he translated the book of Job, and says in his epistle on the translation, that they could sometimes scarcely finish three lines in four days. And while engaged upon the translation, he wrote to Spalatin, in his naïve strong way, that Job seemed to bear his translation less patiently than the consolation of his friends, and would rather remain seated on his dunghill. Jerome Weller, a man who, from inward experience similar to that described in this book, was qualified above many to be its expositor, felt the same unsatisfactoriness. An expositor of Job, says he, must have lain on the same bed of sickness as Job, and have tasted in some measure the bitter experience of Job. Such an expositor was Weller, sorely tried in the school of affliction. But his exposition does not extend beyond the twelfth chapter; and he is glad when at last, by God's grace, he has got through the twelve chapters, as through firm and hard rock; the remaining chapters he commends to another. The most comprehensive work of the Reformation period on the book of Job, is the Sermons (conciones) of Calvin. The exegesis of the pre-rationalistic period advanced beyond these performances of the reformers only in proportion as philological learning extended, particularly Mercier and Cocceius in the Reformed, Seb. Schmid in the Lutheran, Joannes de Pineda in the Romish Church. The Commentary of the last named (Madrid, 1597), a surprisingly learned compilation, was also used and admired by Protestants, but zealously guards the immaculateness of the Vulgate. The commentaries of the German reformers are to the present day unsurpassed for the comprehension of the fundamental truth of the book.

With the Commentary of Albert Schultens, a Dutchman (2 vols. 1737), a new epoch in the exposition begins. He was the first to bring the Semitic languages, and chiefly the Arabic, to bear on the translation of the book. And rightly so,¹ for the Arabic has retained more that is ancient than any other Semitic dialect; and Jerome, in his preface to Daniel, had before correctly remarked, Iob cum arabica lingua plurimam habet societatem. Reiske (Conjecturæ in Iobum, 1779) and Schnurrer (Animadv. ad quædam loca Iobi, 1781) followed later in the footsteps of Schultens; but in proportion as the Israelitish element was considered in its connection with the Oriental, the divine distinctiveness of the former was forgotten. Nevertheless, the book of Job had far less to suffer than the other biblical books from rationalism, with its frivolous moral judgments and distorted interpretations of Scripture: it reduced the idea of the book to tameness, and Satan, here with more apparent reason than elsewhere, was regarded as a mythical invention; but there were, however, no miracles and prophecies to be got rid of.

And as, for the first time since the apostolic period, attention was now given to the book as a poetical masterpiece, substantial advantage arose to the exposition itself from the translations and explanations of an Eckermann, Moldenhauer, Stuhlmann, and others. What a High-German rhymster of the fourteenth century, made known by Hennig, and the Florentine national poet Julianio Dati at the beginning of the sixteenth century, accomplished in their poetical reproductions of the book of Job, is here incomparably surpassed. What might not the fathers have accomplished if they had only had at their disposal such a translation of the book of Job as e.g. that of Böckel, or of the pious Miss Elizabeth Smith, skilled in the Oriental languages (died, in her twenty-eighth year, 1805),¹ or of a studious Swiss layman (Notes to the Hebrew Text of the Old Testament, together with a Translation of the Book of Job, Basel 1841)?

The way to the true and full perception of the divine in Scripture is through the human : hence rationalism—especially after Herder, whose human mode of perception improved and deepened—prepared the way for a new era in the church's exposition of the book of Job. The Commentaries of Samuel Lee (1837), Vaihinger (1842), Welte (1849), Hahn (1850), and Schlottmann (1851),² are the first-fruits of this new period, rendered possible by the earlier Commentaries of Umbreit (1824–32), Ewald (1836–51), and Hirzel (1839, second edition, edited by Olshausen, 1852), of whom the first³ is characterized by enthusiasm for the poetical grandeur of the book, the second by vivid perception of the tragical, and the third by sound tact and good arrangement,—three qualifications which a young Scotch investigator, A. B. Davidson, strives, not unsuccessfully, to unite in his Commentary (vol. i. 1862).⁴ Besides these substantially progressive works, there is the Commentary of Heiligstedt (1847), which is only a recapitulatory clavis after the style of Rosenmüller, but more condensed; and for what modern Jewish commentaries, as those of Blumenfeld, Arnheim (1836), and Löwenthal (1846), contain beyond the standpoint of the earlier פרושים and באורים, they are almost entirely indebted to their Christian predecessors. Also in the more condensed form of translations, with accompanying explanations, the understanding of the book of Job has been in many ways advanced. We may mention here the translations of Köster (1831), who first directed attention to the strophe-structure of Hebrew poetry, but who also, since he regarded the Masoretic verse as the constructive element of the strophe, has introduced an error which has not been removed even to the present day; Stickel (1842), who has, not untastefully, sought to imitate the form of this masterpiece, although his division of the Masoretic verse into strophe lines, according to the accents, like Hirzel's and Meier's in Canticles, is the opposite extreme to the mistake of Köster; Ebrard (1858), who translates in iambic pentameters, as Hosse had previously done;¹ and Renan, who solely determines his arrangement of the stichs by the Masoretic division of verses, and moreover haughtily displays his scornful opposition to Christianity in the prefatory Etude.² Besides, apart from the general commentaries (Bibelwerke), among which that of Von Gerlach (Bd. iii. des A. T. 1849) may be mentioned as the most noted, and such popular practical expositions as Diedrich's (1858), many—some in the interest of poetry generally (as Spiess, attention to the Commentary of Carey (1858), in which the archæology and geography of the book of Job is illustrated by eighty woodcuts and a map.

1852), others in the interest of biblical theology (as Haupt, 1847; Hosse, 1849; Hayd, 1859; Birkholz, 1859; and in Sweden, Lindgren, Upsala 1831)—have sought to render the reading of the book of Job easier and more profitable by means of a translation, with a short introduction and occasional explanations.

Even with all these works before us, though they are in part excellent and truly serviceable, it cannot be affirmed that the task of the exposition has been exhaustively performed, so that absolutely no plus ultra remains. To adjust the ideal meaning of the book according to its language, its bearing on the history of redemption, and its spiritual character,—and throughout to indicate the relation of the single parts to the idea which animates the whole, is, and remains, a great task worthy of ever-new exertion. We will try to perform it, without presuming that we are able to answer all the claims on the expositor. The right expositor of the book of Job must before everything else bring to it a believing apprehension of the work of Christ, in order that he may be able to comprehend this book from its connection with the historical development of the plan of redemption, whose unity is the work of Christ. Further, he must be able to give himself up freely and cheerfully to the peculiar vein of this (together with Ecclesiastes) most bold of all Old Testament books, in order that he may gather from the very heart its deeply hidden idea. Not less must he possess historical perception, in order that he may be able to appreciate the relativity with which, since the plan of salvation is actually and confessedly progressive, the development of the idea of the book is burdened, notwithstanding its absolute truth in itself. Then he must not only have a clear perception of the divinely true, but also of the beautiful in human art, in order to be able to appreciate the wonderful blending of the divine and human in the form as in the contents. Finally, he must stand on the pinnacle of linguistic and antiquarian knowledge, in order to be able to follow the lofty flight of its language, and become familiar with the incomparably rich variety of its matter. This ideal of an expositor of the book of Job we will keep in view, and seek, as near as possible, to attain within the limit assigned to this condensed exegetical handbook.

TRANSLATION AND EXPOSITION OF THE BOOK OF JOB.

Επ' αὐτῶν τῶν λέξεων [τοῦ βιβλίου] γενόμενοι σαφηνίσωμεν τὴν ἔννοιαν, αὐτοῦ ποδηγοῦντος ἡμᾶς πρὸς τὴν ἐρμηνείαν, τοῦ καὶ τὸν ἅγιον Ἰωβ πρὸς τοὺς ἀγῶνας ἐνισχύσαντος.—OLYMPIODOROS.

THE OPENING.

CHAP. I.—III.

JOB'S PIETY IN THE MIDST OF THE GREATEST PROSPERITY.—CHAP. I. 1–5.

THE book begins in prose style: as Jerome says, Prosa incipit, versu labitur, pedestri sermone finitur. Prologue and epilogue are accordingly excepted from the poetical accentuation, and are accented according to the usual system, as the first word shows; for תִּבִּיר has, in correct editions, Tebir, a smaller distinctive, which does not belong to the poetical accentuation. The writer does not begin with יְהִי, as the writers of the historico-prophetical books, who are conscious that they are relating a portion of the connection of the collective Israelitish history, e.g. 1 Sam. i. 1, יְהִי אֵלֵינוּ, but, as the writer of the book of Esther (ii. 5) for a similar reason, with אֵשׁ הָיָה, because he is beginning a detached extra-Israelitish history.

Ver. 1. There was a man in the land of Uz, whose name was Job; and that man was perfect and upright, and one that feared God, and eschewed evil.

The LXX. translates, ἐν χώρᾳ τῇ Αὐσιτίδι; and adds at the close of the book, ἐπὶ τοῖς ὁρίοις τῆς Ἰδουμαίας καὶ Ἀραβίας, therefore north-east from Idumea, towards the Arabian desert. There, in the Arabian desert west from Babylon, under the Caucabenes, according to Ptolemy (v. 19, 2), the Αἰσιῖται (Αἰσεῖται), i.e. the Uzzites, dwelt. This determination of the position of Uz is the most to be relied on. It tends indirectly to confirm this, that Οὖσος, in Jos. Ant. i. 6, 4, is described as founder of Trachonitis and Damascus; that the Jakut Hamawi and Moslem tradition generally (as recently Fries, Stud. u. Krit. 1854, ii.) call the East Hauran fertile tract of country north-west of Têmâ and Bûzân, el-Bethenije, the district of Damascus in which Job dwelt;¹ that the Syrian tradition also transfers the dwelling-place of Job to Hauran, where, in the district of Damascus, a monastery to his honour is called Dair Ejjub (vid. Volck, Calendarium Syriacum, p. 29). All these accounts agree that Uz is not to be sought in Idumæa proper (Gebâl). And the early historical genealogies (Gen. x. 23, xxii. 21, xxxvi. 28) are not unfavourable to this, since they place Uz in relation to Seir-Edom on the one hand, and on the other to Aram: the perplexing double occurrence of such names as Têmâ and Dûma, both in Idumæa and East Hauran, perhaps just results from the mixing of the different tribes through migration. But at all events, though Uz did not lie in Gebâl, yet both from Lam. iv. 21, and on account of the reference in the book of Job itself to the Horites (ch. xxiv. 30), a geographical connection between Idumæa and Ausitis is to be held; and from Jer. xxv. 20 one is warranted in supposing, that עֲרַב, with which the Arabic name of Esau, عيس (العيس), perhaps not accidentally accords, was the collective name of the northern part of the Arabian desert, extending north-east

from Idumæa towards Syria. Here, where the aborigines of Seir were driven back by the Aramaic immigrants, and to where in later times the territory of Edom extended, dwelt Job. His name is not symbolic with reference to the following history. It has been said, אִיּוֹב signifies one hostilely treated, by Satan namely.¹ But the following reasons are against it: (1) that none of the other names which occur in the book are symbolically connected with the history; (2) that the form קָפוּל has never a properly passive signification, but either active, as יָפוּר, reprover (as parallel form with קָפַל), or neuter, as יָלוּר, born, שָׁבוּר, drunken, also occasionally infinitive (vid. Fürst, Concord. p. 1349 s.), so that it may be more natural, with Ewald, after the Arabic (أَيُّوب, cognate with שׂוּב, perhaps also בּוֹשׁ), to explain the “penitent one” [resipiscens]. Similar in sound are, יִזָּב, the name of one of the sons of Issachar (Gen. xli. 13); the name of the Idumæan king, יִזָּבָבֶה, Gen. xxxvi. 33 (which the LXX., Aristeas, Jul. Africanus,² combine with Job); and the name of the king of Mauritania, Juba, which in Greek is written Ἰόβας (Didymus Chalcenter. ed. Schmidt, p. 305): perhaps all these names belong to the root יָב, to shout with joy. The LXX. writes Ἰώβ with lenis; elsewhere the א at the beginning is rendered by asper, e.g. Ἀβραάμ, Ἡλίας. Luther writes Hiob; he has preferred the latter mode, that it may not be read Job with consonantal Jod, when it should be Iob, as e.g. it is read by the English. It had been more correctly Ijob, but Luther wished to keep to the customary form of the name so far as he could; so we, by writing Iob with vowel I, do not wish to deviate too much from the mode of writing and pronunciation customary since Luther.¹

The writer intentionally uses four synonyms together, in order to describe as strongly as possible Job's piety, the reality and purity of which is the fundamental assumption of the history. הָם, with the whole heart disposed towards God and what is good, and also well-disposed toward mankind; יִשָּׁר, in thought and action without deviation conformed to that which is right; יִרָא אֱלֹהִים, fearing God, and consequently being actuated by the fear of God, which is the beginning (i.e. principle) of wisdom; פָּר מִרָע, keeping aloof from evil, which is opposed to God. The first predicate recalls Gen. xxv. 27, the fourth the proverbial Psalms (xxxiv. 15, xxxvii. 27) and Prov. xiv. 16. This mingling of expressions from Genesis and Proverbs is characteristic. First now, after the history has been begun in prætt., aorr. follow.

Vers. 2 sq. And there were born unto him seven sons and three daughters. His substance also was seven thousand sheep, and three thousand camels, and five hundred yoke of oxen, and five hundred she-asses, and servants in great number; so that this man was the greatest of all the men of the east.

It is a large, princely household. The numbers are large, but must not on that account be considered an invention. The four animals named include both kinds. With the doubled אַלְפֵי corresponds the also constructive מֵאֹת, the Tsere of which is never shortened, though in the singular one says מֵאָה, from מֵאָה. The aorists, especially of the verb הָיָה (הוּה), which, according to its root, signifies not so much esse as feri, existere, are intended to place us at once in the midst of his prosperity. Ex iis, says Leo Africanus in reference to flocks, Arabes suas divitias ac possessiones æstimant. In fine, Job was without his equal among the בני קרם. So the tribes are called which extend from Arabia Deserta, lying to the east of Palestine, northwards to the countries on the Euphrates, and south over Arabia Petræa and Felix. The wisdom of these tribes, treasured up in proverbs, songs, and traditions, is mentioned in 1 Kings v. 10, side by side with the wisdom of the Egyptians. The writer now takes a very characteristic feature from the life of Job, to show that, even in the height of prosperity, he preserved and manifested the piety affirmed of him.

Vers. 4 sq. And his sons went and feasted in the house of him whose day it was, and sent and called for their sisters to eat and drink with them. And it happened, when the days of their feasting were gone about, that Job sent and sanctified them, and rose up early in the morning, and offered burnt-offerings according to the number of them all: for Job said, It may be that my sons have sinned, and dismissed God from their hearts. Thus did Job continually.

The subordinate facts precede, ver. 4, in perff.; the chief fact follows, ver. 5, in fut. consec. The perff. describe, according to Ges. § 126, 3, that which has happened repeatedly in the past, as e.g. Ruth iv. 7; the fut. consec. the customary act of Job, in conjunction with this occurrence. The consecutio temporum is exactly like 1 Sam. i. 3 sq.

It is questionable whether בֵּית אִישׁ is a distinct adverbial expression, in domu uniuscujusque, and יוֹמו also distinct, die ejus (Hirz. and others); or whether the three words are only one adverbial expression, in domo ejus cujus dies erat, which latter we prefer. At all events, יוֹמו here, in this connection, is not, with Hahn, Schlottm., and others, to be understood of the birthday, as ch. iii. 1. The text, understood simply as it stands, speaks of a weekly round (Oehler and others). The seven sons took it in turn to dine with one another the week round, and did not forget their sisters in the loneliness of the parental home, but added them to their number. There existed among them a family peace and union which had been uninterruptedly cherished; but early on the morning of every eighth day, Job instituted a solemn service for his family, and offered sacrifices for his ten children, that they might obtain forgiveness for any sins of frivolity into which they might have fallen in the midst of the mirth of their family gatherings.

The writer might have represented this celebration on the evening of every seventh day, but he avoids even the slightest reference to anything Israelitish: for there is no mention in Scripture of any celebration of the Sabbath before the time of Israel. The sacred observance of the Sabbath, which was consecrated by God the Creator, was first expressly enjoined by the Sinaitic Thora. Here the family celebration falls on the morning of the Sunday,—a remarkable prelude to the New Testament celebration of Sunday in the age before the giving of the law, which is a type of the New Testament time after the law. The fact that Job, as father of the family, is the Cohen of his house,—a right of priesthood which the fathers of Israel exercised at the first passover (פסח מצרים), and from which a relic is still retained in the annual celebration of the passover (פסח הדורות),—is also characteristic of the age prior to the law. The standpoint of this age is also further faithfully preserved in this particular, that עולה here, as also ch. xlii. 8, appears pre-eminently as an expiatory offering; whilst in the Mosaic ritual, although it still indeed serves לכפר (Lev. i. 4), as does every blood-offering, the idea of expiation as its peculiar intention is transferred to הַמִּזְבֵּחַ and אֵשׁ. Neither of these forms of expiatory offering is here mentioned. The blood-offering still bears its most general generic name, עֹלָה, which it received after the flood. This name indicates that the offering is one which, being consumed by fire, is designed to ascend in flames and smoke. הַעֲלָה refers not so much to bringing it up to the raised altar, as to causing it to rise in flame and smoke, causing it to ascend to God, who is above. קִדְּשׁ is the outward cleansing and the spiritual preparation for the celebration of the sacred festival, as Ex. xix. 14. It is scarcely necessary to remark, that the masculine suffixes refer also to the daughters. There were ten whole sacrifices offered by Job on each opening day of the weekly round, therefore at the dawn of the Sunday, since one has to imagine this round of entertainment as beginning with the first-born on the first day of the week. "Perhaps," says Job, "my children have sinned, and bidden farewell to God in their hearts." Undoubtedly, בִּרְךָ signifies elsewhere (1 Kings xxi. 10; Ps. x. 3), according to a so-called ἀντιφραστική εὐφημία, maledicere. This signification also suits ch. ii. 5, but does not at all suit ch. ii. 9. This latter passage supports the signification valedicere, which arises from the custom of pronouncing a benediction or benedictory salutation at parting (e.g. Gen. xlvii. 10). Job is afraid lest his children may have become somewhat unmindful of God during their mirthful gatherings. In Job's family, therefore, there was an earnest desire for sanctification, which was far from being satisfied with mere outward propriety of conduct. Sacrifice (which is as old as the sin of mankind) was to Job a means of grace, by which he cleansed himself and his family every week from inward blemish. The futt. consec. are followed by perff., which are governed by them. בִּכְה, however, is followed by the fut., because in historical connection (cf. on the other hand, Num. viii. 26), in the signifi-

cation, faciebat h.e. facere solebat (Ges. § 127, 4, b). Thus Job did every day, i.e. continually. As head of the family, he faithfully discharged his priestly vocation, which permitted him to offer sacrifice as an early Gentile servant of God. The writer has now made us acquainted with the chief person of the history which he is about to record, and in ver. 6 begins the history itself.

JEHOVAH'S DETERMINATION TO TRY JOB.—CHAP. I. 6–12.

He transfers us from earth to heaven, where everything that happens on earth has its unseen roots, its final causes.

Ver. 6. Now there was a day when the sons of God came to present themselves before Jehovah; and Satan came also in the midst of them.

The translation “it happened on a day” is rejected in Ges. § 109, rem. 1, c.¹ The article, it is there said, refers to what precedes—the day, at the time; but this favourite mode of expression is found at the beginning of a narrative, even when it cannot be considered to have any reference to what has preceded, e.g. 2 Kings iv. 18. The article is used in the opposite manner here, because the narrator in thought connects the day with the following occurrence; and this frees it from absolute indefiniteness: the western mode of expression is different. From the writer assigning the earthly measure of time to the place of God and spirits, we see that celestial things are represented by him parabolically. But the assumptions on which he proceeds are everywhere recognised in Scripture; for (1.) בְּנֵי הָאֱלֹהִים, as the name of the celestial spirits, is also found out of the book of Job (Gen. vi. 2; cf.

Ps. xxix. 1, lxxxix. 7, Dan. iii. 25). They are so called, as beings in the likeness of God, which came forth from God in the earliest beginning of creation, before this material world and man came into existence (ch. xxxviii. 4–7): the designation בְּנֵי points to the particular manner of their creation. (2.) Further, it is the teaching of Scripture, that these are the nearest attendants upon God, the nearest created glory, with which He has surrounded himself in His eternal glory, and that He uses them as the immediate instruments of His cosmical rule. This representation underlies Gen. i. 26, which Philo correctly explains, διαλέγεται ὁ τῶν ὅλων πατήρ ταῖς ἑαυτοῦ δυνάμεσιν; and in Ps. lxxxix. 6–8, a psalm which is closely allied to the book of Job, לְהַקְדִּים and רוּחַ, of the holy ones, is just the assembly of the heavenly spirits, from which, as ἄγγελοι of God, they go forth into the universe and among men. (3.) It is also further the teaching of Scripture, that one of these spirits has withdrawn himself from the love of God, has reversed the truth of his bright existence, and in sullen ardent self-love is become the enemy of God, and everything godlike in the creature. This spirit is called, in reference to God and the creature, שָׂטָן, from the verb שָׂטַן, to come in the way, oppose, treat with enmity,—a name which occurs first here, and except here occurs only in Zech. iii. and 1 Chron. xxi. 1. Since the Chokma turned, with a decided preference, to the earliest records of the world and mankind before the rise of nationalities, it must have known the existence of this God-opposing spirit from Gen. ii. sq. The frequent occurrence of the tree of life and the way of life in the Salomonic Proverbs, shows how earnestly the research of that time was engaged with the history of Paradise: so that it cannot be surprising that it coined the name שָׂטָן for that evil spirit. (4.) Finally, it agrees with 1 Kings xxii. 19–22, Zech. iii., on the one hand, and Apoc. xii. on the other, that Satan here appears still among the good spirits, resembling Judas Iscariot among the disciples until his treachery was revealed. The work of redemption, about which his enmity to God overdid itself, and by which his damnation is perfected, is during the whole course of the Old Testament history incomplete.

Herder, Eichhorn, Lutz, Ewald, and Umbreit, see in this distinct placing of Satan in relation to the Deity and good spirits nothing but a change of representations arising from foreign influences; but if Jesus Christ is really the vanquisher of Satan, as He himself says, the realm of spirits must have a history, which is divided into two eras by this triumph. Moreover, both the Old and New Testaments agree herein, that Satan is God's adversary, and consequently altogether evil, and must notwithstanding serve God, since He makes even evil minister to His purpose of salvation, and the working out of His plan in the government of the world. This is the chief thought which underlies the further progress of the scene. The earthly elements of time, space, and dialogue, belong to the poetic drapery.

Instead of עַל הַתִּיַּצֵּב, לִפְנֵי is used elsewhere (Prov. xxii. 29) : עַל is a usage of language derived from the optical illusion of the one who is in the foreground seeming to surpass the one in the background. It is an assembly day in heaven. All the spirits present themselves to render their account, and expecting to receive commands; and the following dialogue ensues between Jehovah and Satan :—

Ver. 7. Then Jehovah said to Satan, Whence comest thou? Satan answered Jehovah, and said, From going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it.

The fut. follows מֵאַיִן in the signification of the præs., Whence comest thou? the perf. would signify, Whence hast thou come? (Ges. § 127, 2.) Cocceius subtly observes: Notatur Satanas velut Deo nescio h.e. non adprobante res suas agere. It is implied in the question that his business is selfish, arbitrary, and has no connection with God. In his answer, שׁוֹטָף, as 2 Sam. xxiv. 2, signifies rapid passing from one end to the other; הַתְּהַלֵּךְ, an observant roaming forth. Peter also says of Satan, περιπατεῖ (1 Pet. v. 8 sq.).¹ He answers at first generally, as expecting a more particular question, which Jehovah now puts to him.

Ver. 8. Then said Jehovah to Satan, Hast thou considered my servant Job? for there is none like him in the earth, a perfect and an upright man, one that feareth God and escheweth evil.

By כִּי Jehovah gives the reason of His inquiry. Had Satan been observant of Job, even he must have confessed that there was on the earth real genuine piety. שֵׁם לֵב, animus advertere (for לֵב is animus, נֶפֶשׁ anima), is construed with עַל, of the object on which the attention falls, and on which it fixes itself, or אֶל, of the object towards which it is directed (ch. ii. 3). The repetition of the four predicates used of Job (ver. 1) in the mouth of Jehovah (though without the waw combining both pairs there) is a skilful touch of the poet. Further on, the narrative is also interwoven with poetic repetitions (as e.g. ch. xxxiv. and Gen. i.), to give it architectural symmetry, and to strengthen the meaning and impression of what is said. Jehovah triumphantly displays His servant, the incomparable one, in opposition to Satan; but this does not disconcert him: he knows how, as on all occasions, so here also, to deny what Jehovah affirms.

Vers. 9-11. Then Satan answered Jehovah, and said, Doth Job fear God for nought? Hast Thou not made a hedge about him, and about his house, and about all that he hath on every side? Hast Thou not blessed the work of his hands, and his substance is increased in the land? But put forth Thine hand now, and touch all that he hath: truly he will renounce Thee to Thy face!

Satan is, according to the Apoc. xii. 10, the κατήγωρ who accuses the servants of God day and night before God. It is a fact respecting the invisible world, though expressed in the language and imagery of this world. So long as he is not finally vanquished and condemned, he has access to God, and thinks to justify himself by denying the truth of the existence and the possibility of the continuance of all piety. God permits it; for since all that happens among His creatures is placed under the law of free development, evil in the world of spirits is also free to maintain and expand itself, until a spiritual power comes forward against it, by which the hitherto wavering conflict between the principles of good and evil is for ever decided. This is the truth contained in the poetic description of the heavenly scene, sadly mistaken by Umbreit in his Essay on Sin, 1853, in which he explains Satan, according to Ps. cix. 6, as a creation of our author's fancy. The paucity of the declarations respecting Satan in the Old Testament has misled him. And indeed the historical advance from the Old Testament to the New, though in itself well authorized, has in many ways of late induced to the levelling of the heights and depths of the New Testament. Formerly Umbreit was of the opinion, as many are still, that the idea of Satan is derived from Persia; but between Ahriman (Angramainyus) and Satan there is no striking resemblance;¹ whereas Diestel, in his Abh. über Set-Typhon, Asasel und Satan, Stud. u. Krit., 1860, 2, cannot indeed recognise any connection between לשון and the Satan of the book of Job, but maintains a more complete harmony in all essential points between the latter and the Egyptian Typhon, and infers that "to Satan is therefore to be denied a purely Israelitish originality, the natural outgrowth of the Hebrew mind. It is indeed no special honour for Israel to be able to call him their own. He never has taken firm hold on the Hebrew consciousness." But how should it be no honour for Israel, the people to whom the revelation of redemption was made, and in whose history the plan of redemption was developed, to have traced the poisonous stream of evil up to the fountain of its first free beginning in the spiritual world, and to have more than superficially understood the history of the fall of mankind by sin, which points to a disguised super-human power, opposed to the divine will? This perception undoubtedly only begins gradually to dawn in the Old Testament; but in the New Testament, the abyss of evil is fully disclosed, and Satan has so far a hold on the consciousness of Jesus, that He regards His life's vocation as a conflict with Satan. And the Protevangelium is deciphered in facts, when the promised seed of the woman crushed the serpent's head, but at the same time suffered the bruising of its own heel.

The view (e.g. Lutz in his Biblische Dogmatik) that Satan as he is represented in the book of Job is not the later evil spirit, is to be rejected: he appears here only first, say Herder and Eichhorn, as impartial executor of judgment, and overseer of morality, commissioned by God. But he denies what God affirms, acknowledges no love towards God in the world which is not rooted in self-love, and is determined to destroy this love as a mere semblance. Where piety is dulled, he rejoices in its obscurity; where it is not, he dims its lustre by reflecting his own egotistical nature therein. Thus it is in Zech. iii., and so here. Genuine love loves God אֱלֹהִים

(adverb from לָן, like gratis from gratia): it loves Him for His own sake; it is a relation of person to person, without any actual stipulations and claim. But Job does not thus fear God; יָרָא is here præteritum, whereas in vers. 1 and 8 it is the adjective. God has indeed hitherto screened him from all evil; שָׁבַתָּ from שָׁוָה, sepire, and בָּעַר (בָּעַר) composed of בָּ and עַר, in the primary signification circum, since עַר expresses that the one joins itself to the other, and בָּ that it covers it, or covers itself with it. By the addition of מִסְבִּיב, the idea of the triple בָּעַר is still strengthened. מַעֲשֵׂה, LXX., Vulg. have translated by the plural, which is not false according to the thought; for מַעֲשֵׂה יָדַיִם is, especially in Deuteronomy, a favourite collective expression for human enterprise. פָּרַץ, one word with the Sanskrito-Sem. frangere, related to פָּרַק, signifying to break through the bounds, multiply and increase one's self unboundedly (Gen. xxx. 30, and freq.). The particle אֵלֶּם, proper only to the oldest and classic period, and very commonly used in the first four books of the Pentateuch, and in our book, generally וְאֵלֶּם, is an emphatic "nevertheless;" Lat. (suited to this passage at least) verum enim vero. אִם-לֹא is either, as frequently, a shortened formula of asseveration: May such and such happen to me if he do not, etc., = forsooth he will (LXX. ἢ μὴ); or it is half a question: Attempt only this and this, whether he will not deny thee, = annon, as ch. xvii. 2, xxii. 20. The first perhaps suits the character of Satan better: he affirms that God is mistaken. בִּרְדִּי signifies here also, valedicere: he will say farewell to thee, and indeed עַל-פָּנֶיךָ (as Isa. lxxv. 3), meeting thee arrogantly and shamelessly: it signifies, properly, upon thy countenance, i.e. say it to thee, to the very face, that he will have nothing more to do with thee (comp. on ch. ii. 5). In order now that the truth of His testimony to Job's piety, and this piety itself, may be tried, Jehovah surrenders all Job's possessions, all that is his, except himself, to Satan.

Ver. 12. Then Jehovah said to Satan, Behold, all that he hath is in thy hand; only upon himself put not forth thy hand. And Satan went forth from the presence of Jehovah.

Notice well: The divine permission appears at the same time as a divine command, for in general there is not a permission by which God remains purely passive; wherefore God is even called in Scripture creator mali (the evil act as such only excepted), Isa. xlv. 7. Further, the divine arrangement has not its foundation in the sin which still clings to Job. For in the praise conferred upon Job, it is not said that he is absolutely without sin: universal liability to sin is assumed not only of all the unrighteousness, but even of all the righteousness, of Adam's race. Thirdly, the permission proceeds, on the contrary, from God's purpose to establish, in opposition to Satan, the righteousness which, in spite of the universal liability to sin, is peculiar to Job; and if we place this single instance in historical connection with the development of the plan of redemption, it is a part of the conflict of the woman's seed with the serpent, and of the gradual degradation of Satan to the lake of fire. After Jehovah's permission, Satan retires forthwith. The licence is welcome to him, for he delights in the work of destruction. And he hopes to conquer. For after he has experienced the unlimited power of evil over himself, he has lost all faith in the power of good, and is indeed become himself the self-deceived father of lies.

THE FOUR MESSENGERS OF MISFORTUNE.—CHAP. I. 13 SQQ.

Satan now accomplishes to the utmost of his power, by repeated blows, that which Jehovah had granted to him: first on Job's oxen, and asses, and herdsmen.

Vers. 13-15. And it came to pass one day, when his sons and his daughters were eating and drinking wine in the house of their eldest brother, that a messenger came to Job, and said, The oxen were ploughing, and the asses feeding beside them, when the Sabeans fell upon them, and carried them away, and smote the servants with the edge of the sword; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

The principal clause, וַיְהִי הַיּוֹם, in which the art. of הַיּוֹם has no more reference to anything preceding than in ver. 6, is immediately followed by an adverbial clause, which may be expressed by participles, Lat. filiis ejus filiabusque convivantibus. The details which follow are important. Job had celebrated the usual weekly worship early in the morning with his children, and knew that they were met together in the house of his eldest son, with whom the order of mutual entertainment came round again, when the messengers of misfortune began to break in upon him: it is therefore on the very day when, by reason of the sacrifice offered, he was quite sure of Jehovah's favour. The participial construction, the oxen were ploughing (vid. Ges. § 134, 2, c), describes the condition which was disturbed by the calamity that befell them. The verb הָיָה stands here because the clause is a principal one, not as ver. 13, adverbial. עַל-יָדֵי, properly "at hand," losing its radical meaning, signifies (as Judg. xi. 26) "close by." The interpretation "in their places," after Num. ii. 17, is untenable, as this signification of יָד is only supported in the sing. יָדָא is construed as fem., since the name of the country is used as the name of the people. In Genesis three races of this name are mentioned: Cushite (x. 7), Joktanish (x. 28), and Abrahamic (xxv. 3). Here the nomadic portion of this mixed race in North Arabia from the Persian Gulf to Idumæa is intended. Luther, for the sake of clearness, translates here, and 1 Kings x. 1, Arabia. In וַאֲמַלְטָה, the waw, as is seen from the Kametz, is waw convertens, and the paragogic ah, which otherwise indicates the cohortative, is either without significance, or simply adds intensity to the verbal idea: I have saved myself with great difficulty. For this common form of the 1 fut. consec., occurring four times in the Pentateuch, vid. Ges. § 49, 2. The clause לְהַגִּיד לָךְ is objective: in order that—so it was intended by the calamity—I might tell thee.

THE SECOND MESSENGER: Ver. 16. While he was yet speaking, another came, and said, The fire of God fell from heaven, and set fire to the sheep and servants, and consumed them; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

The fire of God, which descends, is not a suitable expression for Samûm (Schlottm.), that wind of the desert which often so suddenly destroys man and beast, although indeed it is indicated by certain atmospheric phenomena, appearing first of a yellow colour, which changes to a leaden hue and spreads through the atmosphere, so that the sun when at the brightest becomes a dark red. The writer, also, can scarcely have intended lightning (Rosenm., Hirz., Hahn), but rain of fire or brimstone, as with Sodom and Gomorrha, and as 1 Kings xviii. 38, 2 Kings i. 12.

THE THIRD MESSENGER: Ver. 17. While he was yet speaking, there came also another, and said, The Chaldeans ranged themselves in three bands, and rushed upon the camels, and carried them away, and slew the servants with the edge of the sword; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

Without any authority, Ewald sees in this mention of the Chaldeans an indication of the composition of the book in the seventh century B.C., when the Chaldeans under Nabopolassar began to inherit the Assyrian power. Following Ewald, Renan observes that the Chaldeans first appear as such marauders about the time of Uzziah. But in Genesis we find mention of early Semitic Chaldeans among the mountain ranges lying to the north of Assyria and Mesopotamia; and later, Nahor Chaldeans of Mesopotamia, whose existence is traced back to the patriarchal times (vid. Genesis, p. 422¹), and who were powerful enough at any time to make a raid into Idumæa. To make an attack divided into several ראשִׁים, heads, multitudes, bands (two—Gen. xiv. 15; three—Judg. vii. 16, 1 Sam. xi. 11; or four—Judg. ix. 34), is an ancient military stratagem; and פָּשַׁט, e.g. Judg. ix. 33, is the proper word for attacks of such bands, either for plunder or revenge. In לפִּי־חֶרֶב, at the edge of the sword, à l'épée, לֵ is like the usual acc. of manner.

THE FOURTH MESSENGER: Ver. 18 sq. While he was yet speaking, another also came, and said, Thy sons and thy daughters were eating and drinking wine in their eldest brother's house: and, behold, a great wind came across from the desert, and smote the four corners of the house, and it fell upon the young people, and they are dead; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

Instead of עוֹר, we have עַר here: the former denotes continuity in time, the latter continuity in space, and they may be interchanged. עַר in the signif. "while" is here construed with the participle, as Neh. vii. 3; comp. other constructions, ch. viii. 21, 1 Sam. xiv. 19, Jonah iv. 2. "From the other side of the desert" is equivalent to, from its farthest end. הַנְּעָרִים are the youthful sons and daughters of Job, according to the epicene use of נַעַר in the Pentateuch (youths and maidens). In one day Job is now bereft of everything which he accounted the gift of Jehovah,—his herds, and with these his servants, which he not only prizes as property, but for whom he has also a tender heart (ch. xxxi.) ; last of all, even his dearest ones, his children. Satan has summoned the elements and men for the destruction of Job's possessions by repeated strokes. That men and nations can be excited by Satan to hostile enterprises, is nothing surprising (cf. Apoc. xx. 8) ; but here, even the fire of God and the hurricane are attributed to him. Is this poetry or truth ? Luther, in the Larger Catechism, question iv., says the same : "The devil causes strife, murder, rebellion, and war, also thunder and lightning, and hail, to destroy corn and cattle, to poison the atmosphere," etc.,—a passage of our creed often ridiculed by rationalism ; but it is correct if understood in accordance with Scripture, and not superstitiously. As among men, so in nature, since the Fall two different powers of divine anger and divine love are in operation : the mingling of these is the essence of the present Kosmos. Everything destructive to nature, and everything arising therefrom which is dangerous and fatal to the life of man, is the outward manifestation of the power of anger. In this power Satan has fortified himself ; and this, which underlies the whole course of nature, he is able to make use of, so far as God may permit it as being subservient to His chief design (comp. Apoc. xiii. 13 with 2 Thess. ii. 9). He has no creative power. Fire and storm, by means of which he works, are of God ; but he is allowed to excite these forces to hostility against man, just as he himself is become an instrument of evil. It is similar with human demonocracy, whose very being consists in placing itself en rapport with the hidden powers of nature. Satan is the great juggler, and has already manifested himself as such, even in paradise and in the temptation of Jesus Christ. There is in nature, as among men, an entanglement of contrary forces which he knows how to unloose, because it is the sphere of his special dominion ; for the whole course of nature, in the change of its phenomena, is subject not only to abstract laws, but also to concrete supernatural powers, both bad and good.

THE CONDUCT OF JOB: Vers. 20 sq. Then Job arose, and rent his mantle, and shaved his head, and fell down upon the ground, and worshipped, and said, Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither: Jehovah gave, and Jehovah hath taken away; blessed be the name of Jehovah.

The first three messengers Job has heard, sitting, and in silence; but at the news of the death of his children, brought by the fourth, he can no longer overcome his grief. The intensity of his feeling is indicated by rising up (cf. Jonah iii. 6); his torn heart, by the rending of his mantle; the conscious loss of his dearest ones, by cutting off the hair of his head. He does not, however, act like one in despair, but, humbling himself under the mighty hand of God, falls to the ground and prostrates himself, i.e. worshipping God, so that his face touches the earth. הִשְׁתַּחֲוָה, se prosternere, this is the gesture of adoration, προσκύνησις.¹ אֶרְצִי is defectively written, as Num. xi. 11; cf. infra, ch. xxxii. 18. The occurrence of שָׁמָּה here is remarkable, and may have given rise to the question of Nicodemus, John iii. 4: μὴ δύναται ἄνθρωπος εἰς τὴν κοιλίαν τῆς μητρὸς αὐτοῦ δεύτερον εἰσελθεῖν. The writer of Ecclesiastes (ch. v. 14) has left out this difficult שָׁמָּה. It means either being put back into a state of unconsciousness and seclusion from the light and turmoil of this world, similar to his former state in his mother's womb, which Hupfeld, in his Commentatio in quosdam Iobidos locos, 1853, favours; or, since the idea of אֶרְצִי בֶּטֶן may be extended, return to the bosom of mother earth (Ew., Hirz., Schlottm., et al.), so that שָׁמָּה is not so much retrospective as rather prospective with reference to the grave (Böttch.), which we prefer; for as the mother's bosom can be compared to the bosom of the earth (Ps. cxxxix. 15), because it is of the earth, and recalls the original forming of man from the earth, so the bosom of the earth is compared to the mother's, Sir. xl. 1: ἀφ' ἡμέρας ἐξόδου ἐκ γαστρὸς μητρὸς ἕως ἡμέρας ἐπιταφῆς εἰς μητέρα πάντων. The writer here intentionally makes Job call God יהוה. In the dialogue portion, the name יהוה occurs only once in the mouth of Job (ch. xii. 9); most frequently the speakers use אלה and שרי. This use of the names of God corresponds to the early use of the same in the Pentateuch, according to which שרי is the proper name of God in the patriarchal days, and יהוה in the later days, to which they were preparatory. The traditional view, that Elohim describes God according to the attribute of justice, Jehovah according to the attribute of mercy, is only in part correct; for even when the advent of God to judgment is announced, He is in general named Jehovah. Rather, אלהים (plur. of אלה, fear), the Revered One, describes God as object; יהוה or יהוה, on the other hand, as subject. אלהים describes Him in the fulness of His glorious majesty, including also the spirits, which are round about Him; יהוה as the Absolute One. Accordingly, Job, when he says יהוה, thinks of God not only as the absolute cause of his fate, but as the Being ordering his life according to His own counsel, who is ever worthy of praise, whether in His infinite wisdom He gives or takes away. Job was not driven from God, but praised Him in the midst of suffering, even when, to human understanding and feeling, there was only occasion for anguish: he destroyed the suspicion of Satan, that he only feared God for the sake of His gifts, not for His own sake; and remained, in the midst of a fourfold temptation, the conqueror.¹ Throughout the whole book he does not go so far as to deny God (בִּרְדָּא אֱלֹהִים), and thus far he does not fall into any unworthy utterances concerning His rule.

Ver. 22. In all this Job sinned not, nor attributed folly to God.

In all this, i.e. as the LXX. correctly renders it : which thus far had befallen him ; Ewald et al. translate incorrectly : he gave God no provocation. תַּפְּלָה signifies, according to ch. xxiv. 12, comp. ch. vi. 6, saltlessness and tastelessness, dealing devoid of meaning and purpose, and is to be translated either, he uttered not, non edidit, anything absurd against God, as Jerome translates, neque stultum quid contra Deum locutus est ; or, he did not attribute folly to God : so that לָּ נָתַן are connected, as Ps. lxviii. 35, Jer. xiii. 16. Since נָתַן by itself nowhere signifies to express, we side with Hirzel and Schlottm. against Rödiger (in his Thes.) and Oehler, in favour of the latter. The writer hints that, later on, Job committed himself by some unwise thoughts of the government of God.

THE FIFTH AND SIXTH TEMPTATION.—CHAP. II. 1–10.

Satan has now exhausted his utmost power, but without success.

Ver. 1. Again there was a day when the sons of God came to present themselves before Jehovah, and Satan came also among them, to present himself before Jehovah.

The clause expressive of the purpose of their appearing is here repeated in connection with Satan (comp. on the contrary, ch. i. 6), for this time he appears with a most definite book of Job, especially the repeated misfortunes which befall the worthy clergyman, his submission under all, and the issue which counterbalances his misfortune. But what is copied from the book of Job appears to be drawn only from its surface, not from its sacred depths.

object. Jehovah addresses Satan as He had done on the former occasion.

Ver. 2. And Jehovah said to Satan, Whence comest thou? And Satan answered Jehovah, and said, From going to and fro in the earth, and wandering up and down in it.

Instead of מַאֲן, ch. i. 7, we have here the similar expression אֵי מָוֶה (Ges. § 150, extra). Such slight variations are also frequent in the repetitions in the Psalms, and we have had an example in ch. i. in the interchange of עֹר and עָר. After the general answer which Satan gives, Jehovah inquires more particularly.

Ver. 3. Then Jehovah said to Satan, Hast thou considered my servant Job? for there is none like him in the earth, a perfect and an upright man, fearing God and eschewing evil; and still he holdeth fast his integrity, although thou hast moved me against him, to injure him without cause.

From the antecedent, that amidst all his sufferings hitherto Job has preserved and proved his הַפְּהָ (except in the book of Job, only Prov. xi. 3), the fut. consec. draws a conclusion: there was no previous reason for the injury which Satan had urged God to decree for Job. הַסִּית does not signify, as Umbreit thinks, to lead astray, in which case it were an almost blasphemous anthropomorphism: it signifies instigate, and indeed generally, to evil, as e.g. 1 Chron. xxi. 1; but not always, e.g. Josh. xv. 18: here it is certainly in a strongly anthropopathical sense of the impulse given by Satan to Jehovah to prove Job in so hurtful a manner. The writer purposely chooses these strong expressions, הַסִּית and בָּלָע. Satan's aim, since he suspected Job still, went beyond the limited power which was given him over Job. Satan even now again denies what Jehovah affirms.

Vers. 4 sq. And Satan answered Jehovah, and said, Skin for skin, and all that man hath will he give for his life: stretch forth yet once Thy hand, and touch his bone, and his flesh, truly he will renounce Thee to Thy face.

Olshausen refers עֹר בְּעֹר עֹר to Job in relation to Jehovah: So long as Thou leavest his skin untouched, he will also leave Thee untouched; which, though it is the devil who speaks, were nevertheless too unbecomingly expressed. Hupfeld understands by the skin, that skin which is here given for the other,—the skin of his cattle, of his servants and children, which Job had gladly given up, that for such a price he might get off with his own skin sound; but בְּעֹר cannot be used as Beth pretii: even in Prov. vi. 26 this is not the case. For the same reason, we must not, with Hirz., Ew., and most, translate, Skin for skin = like for like, which Ewald bases on the strange assertion, that one skin is like another, as one dead piece is like another. The meaning of the words of Satan (rightly understood by Schlottm. and the Jewish expositors) is this: One gives up one's skin to preserve one's skin; one endures pain on a sickly part of the skin, for the sake of saving the whole skin; one holds up the arm, as Raschi suggests, to avert the fatal blow from the head. The second clause is climacteric: a man gives skin for skin; but for his life, his highest good, he willingly gives up everything, without exception, that can be given up, and life itself still retained. This principle derived from experience, applied to Job, may be expressed thus: Just so, Job has gladly given up everything, and is content to have escaped with his life. וְאֵלֶּם, verum enim vero, is connected with this suppressed because self-evident application. The verb נָגַע, above, ch. i. 11, with בְּ, is construed here with אֵל, and expresses increased malignity: Stretch forth Thy hand but once to his very bones, etc. Instead of עַל-פְּנֵי, ch. i. 11, אֶל־פַּ' is used here with the same force : forthwith, fearlessly and regardlessly (comp. ch. xiii. 15 ; Deut. vii. 10), he will bid Thee farewell.

THE GRANT OF NEW POWER : Ver. 6. And Jehovah said to Satan, Behold, he is in thy hand ; only take care of his life.

Job has not forfeited his life ; permission is given to place it in extreme peril, and nothing more, in order to see whether or not, in the face of death, he will deny the God who has decreed such heavy affliction for him. נַפְשׁ does not signify the same as נִיָּם ; it is the soul producing the spirit-life of man. We must, however, translate "life," because we do not use "soul" in the sense of ψυχή, anima.

THE WORKING OUT OF THE PERMISSION : Vers. 7 et seq. Then Satan went forth from the presence of Jehovah, and smote Job with sore boils, from the sole of his foot to his crown. And he took him a potsherd to scrape himself with, and sat in the midst of ashes.

The description of this disease calls to mind Deut. xxviii. 35 with 27, and is, according to the symptoms mentioned further on in the book, elephantiasis (so called because the limbs become jointless lumps like elephants' legs), Arab. جذام, gudhâm, Lat. lepra nodosa, the most fearful form of lepra, which sometimes seizes persons even of the higher ranks. Artapan (C. Müller, Fragm. iii. 222) says, that an Egyptian king was the first man who died of elephantiasis. Baldwin, king of Jerusalem, was afflicted with it in a very dangerous form.¹ The disease begins with the rising of tubercular boils, and at length resembles a cancer spreading itself over the whole body, by which the body is so affected, that some of the limbs fall completely away. Scraping with a potsherd will not only relieve the intolerable itching of the skin, but also remove the matter. Sitting among ashes is on account of the deep sorrow (comp. Jonah iii. 6) into which Job is brought by his heavy losses, especially the loss of his children. The LXX. adds that he sat on a dunghill outside the city: the dunghill is taken from the passage Ps. cxiii. 7, and the "outside the city" from the law of the מִצָּרַיִם. In addition to the four losses, a fifth temptation, in the form of a disease incurable in the eye of man, is now come upon Job: a natural disease, but brought on by Satan, permitted, and therefore decreed, by God. Satan does not appear again throughout the whole book. Evil has not only a personal existence in the invisible world, but also its agents and instruments in this; and by these it is henceforth manifested.

FIRST JOB'S WIFE (who is only mentioned in one other passage (ch. xix. 17), where Job complains that his breath is offensive to her) COMES TO HIM: Ver. 9.
Then his wife said to him, Dost thou still hold fast thine integrity? renounce God, and die.

In the LXX. the words of his wife are unskilfully extended. The few words as they stand are sufficiently charac-

Lahr, 1858 (with lithographs). "The means of cure," says Aretäus the Cappadocian (vid. his writings translated by Mann, 1858, S. 221), "must be more powerful than the disease, if it is to be removed. But what cure can be successfully applied to the fearful evil of elephantiasis? It is not confined to one part, either internally or externally, but takes possession of the entire system. It is terrible and hideous to behold, for it gives a man the appearance of an animal. Every one dreads to live, and have any intercourse, with such invalids; they flee from them as from the plague, for infection is easily communicated by the breath. Where, in the whole range of pharmacy, can such a powerful remedy be found?"

teristic. They are not to be explained, Call on God for the last time, and then die (von Gerl.); or, Call on Him that thou die (according to Ges. § 130, 2); but 𐤒𐤓𐤕 signifies, as Job's answer shows, to take leave of. She therefore counsels Job to do that which Satan has boasted to accomplish. And notwithstanding, Hengstenberg, in his Lecture on the Book of Job (1860),¹ defends her against the too severe judgment of expositors. Her desperation, says he, proceeds from her strong love for her husband; and if she had to suffer the same herself, she would probably have struggled against despair. But love hopeth all things; love keeps its despondency hidden even when it desponds; love has no such godless utterance, as to say, Renounce God; and none so unloving, as to say, Die. No, indeed! this woman is truly diaboli adjutrix (August.); a tool of the tempter (Ebrard); impiæ carnis præco (Brentius). And though Calvin goes too far when he calls her not only organum Satanæ, but even Proserpinam et Furiam infernalem, the title of another Xantippe, against which Hengstenberg defends her, is indeed rather flattery than slander. Tobias' Anna is her copy.² What experience of life and insight the writer manifests in introducing Job's wife as the mocking opposer of his constant piety! Job has lost his children, but this wife he has retained, for he needed not to be tried by losing her: he was tried sufficiently by having her. She is further on once referred to, but even then not to her advantage. Why, asks Chrysostom, did the devil leave him this wife? Because he thought her a good scourge, by which to plague him more acutely than by any other means. Moreover, the thought is not far distant, that God left her to him in order that when, in the glorious issue of his sufferings, he receives everything doubled, he might not have this thorn in the flesh also doubled.¹ What enmity towards God, what uncharitableness towards her husband, is there in her sarcastic words, which, if they are more than mockery, counsel him to suicide! (Ebrard). But he repels them in a manner becoming himself.

² She says to the blind Tobias, when she is obliged to work for the support of the family, and does not act straightforwardly towards him: ποῦ εἰσὶν αἱ ἐλεημοσύναι σου καὶ αἱ δικαιοσύναι σου, ἰδοὺ γνωστὰ πάντα μετὰ σοῦ, i.e. (as Sengelmann, Book of Tobit, 1857, and O. F. Fritzsche, Handbuch zu d. Apokr. Lief. ii. S. 36, correctly explain) one sees from thy misfortunes that thy virtue is not of much avail to thee. She appears still more like Job's wife in the revised text: manifeste vana facta est spes tua et eleemosynæ tuæ modo apparuerunt, i.e. thy benevolence has obviously brought us to poverty. In the text of Jerome a parallel between Tobias and Job precedes this utterance of Tobias' wife.

Ver. 10. But he said to her, As one of the ungodly would speak, thou speakest. Shall we receive good from God, and shall we not also receive evil?

The answer of Job is strong but not harsh, for the אהת (comp. 2 Sam. xiii. 13) is somewhat soothing. The translation "as one of the foolish women" does not correspond to the Hebrew; אֲהַת is one who thinks madly and acts impiously. What follows is a double question, אִם for אִם־וְאִם. The אִם stands at the beginning of the sentence, but logically belongs to the second part, towards which pronunciation and reading must hurry over the first,—a frequent occurrence after interrogative particles, e.g. Num. xvi. 22, Isa. v. 4b; after causal particles, e.g. Isa. xii. 1, Prov. i. 24; after the negative אִם־לֹא, Deut. viii. 12 sqq., and often. Hupfeld renders the thought expressed in the double question very correctly: bonum quidem hucusque a Deo accepimus, malum vero jam non item accipiemus? אִם is found also elsewhere at the beginning of a sentence, although belonging to a later clause, and that indeed not always the one immediately following, e.g. Hos. vi. 11, Zech. ix. 11; the same syntax is to be found with אָרְרָא, אָרְרָא, and רָקַל. רָקַל, like רָמָה, is a word common to the book of Job and Proverbs (xix. 20); besides these, it is found only in books written after the exile, and is more Aramaic than Hebraic. By this answer which Job gives to his wife, he has repelled the sixth temptation. For

Ver. 10b. In all this Job sinned not with his lips.

The Targum adds: but in his thoughts he already cherished sinful words. בְּשִׁפְתָּי is certainly not undesignedly introduced here and omitted in ch. i. 22. The temptation to murmur was now already at work within him, but he was its master, so that no murmur escaped him.

THE SILENT VISIT.—CHAP. II. 11 SQQ.

After the sixth temptation there comes a seventh; and now the real conflict begins, through which the hero of the book passes, not indeed without sinning, but still triumphantly.

Ver. 11. When Job's three friends heard of all this evil that was come upon him, they came every one from his own place; Eliphaz from Teman, and Bildad from Shuach, and Zophar from Naama: for they had made an appointment to come together to go and sympathize with him, and comfort him.

אֱלִיפָז is, according to Gen. xxxvi., an old Idumæan name (transposed = Phasaël in the history of the Herodeans; according to Michaelis, Suppl. p. 87: cui Deus aurum est, comp. ch. xxii. 25), and תִּימָן a district of Idumæa, celebrated for its native wisdom (Jer. xlix. 7; Bar. iii. 22 sq.). But also in East-Hauran a Têmâ is still found (described by Wetzstein in his Bericht über seine Reise in den beiden Trachonen und um das Hauran-Gebirge, Zeitschr. für allg. Erdkunde, 1859), and about fifteen miles south of Têma, a Bûzân suggestive of Elihu's surname (comp. Jer. xxv. 23). שֵׁחַ we know only from Gen. xxv. as the son of Abraham and Keturah, who settled in the east country. Accordingly it must be a district of Arabia lying not very far from Idumæa: it might be compared with trans-Hauran Schakka, though the sound, however, of the word makes it scarcely admissible, which is undoubtedly one and the same with Σακκαλα, east from Batanæa, mentioned in Ptolem. v. 15. נֶעְמָה is a name frequent in Syria and Palestine: there is a town of the Jewish Shephêla (the low ground by the Mediterranean) of this name, Josh. xv. 41, which, however, can hardly be intended here. מִלֵּל is Milel, consequently third pers. with the art. instead of the relative pron. (as, besides here, Gen. xviii. 21, xlvi. 27), vid. Ges. § 109 ad init. The Niph. נִוֵּץ is wrongly taken by some expositors as the same meaning with נִוֵּץ, to confer with, appoint a meeting: it signifies, to assemble themselves, to meet in an appointed place at an appointed time (Neh. vi. 2). Reports spread among the mounted tribes of the Arabian desert with the rapidity of telegraphic despatches.

THEIR ARRIVAL: Ver. 12. And when they lifted up their eyes afar off, and knew him not, they lifted up their voice, and wept; and they rent every one his mantle, and threw dust upon their heads toward heaven.

They saw a form which seemed to be Job, but in which they were not able to recognise him. Then they weep and rend their outer garments, and catch up dust to throw up towards heaven (1 Sam. iv. 12), that it may fall again upon their heads. The casting up of dust on high is the outward sign of intense suffering, and, as von Gerlach rightly remarks, of that which causes him to cry to heaven.

THEIR SILENCE: Ver. 13. And they sat with him upon the ground seven days and seven nights; and none spake a word unto him: for they saw that his pain was very great.

Ewald erroneously thinks that custom and propriety prescribed this seven days' silence; it was (as Ezek. iii. 15) the force of the impression produced on them, and the fear of annoying the sufferer. But their long silence shows that they had not fully realized the purpose of their visit. Their feeling is overpowered by reflection, their sympathy by dismay. It is a pity that they let Job utter the first word, which they might have prevented by some word of kindly solace; for, becoming first fully conscious of the difference between his present and former position from their conduct, he breaks forth with curses.

JOB'S DISCONSOLATE UTTERANCE OF GRIEF.—CHAP. III.

Job's first longer utterance now commences, by which he involves himself in the conflict, which is his seventh temptation or trial.

Vers. 1 sq. After this Job opened his mouth, and cursed his day. And Job spake, and said.

Ver. 2 consists only of three words, which are separated by Rebia; and וַיֹּאמֶר, although Milel, is vocalized וַיֹּאמֶר, because the usual form וַיֹּאמֶר, which always immediately precedes direct narration, is not well suited to close the verse. עָנָה signifies to begin to speak from some previous incitement, as the New Testament ἀποκρίνεσθαι (not always = יָשִׁיב) is also sometimes used.¹ The following utterance of Job, with which the poetic accentuation begins, is analysed by modern critics as follows: vers. 3-10, 11-19, 20-26. Schlottmann calls it three strophes, Hahn three parts, in the first of which delirious cursing of life is expressed; in the second, eager longing for death; in the third, reproachful inquiry after the end of such a life of suffering. In reality they are not strophes. Nevertheless Ebrard is wrong when he maintains that, in general, strophe-structure is as little to be found in the book of Job as in Wallenstein's Monologue. The poetical part of the book of Job is throughout strophic, so far as the nature of the drama admits it. So also even this first speech. Stickel has correctly traced out its divisions; but accidentally, for he has reckoned according to the Masoretic verses. That this is false, he is now fully aware; also Ewald, in his Essay on Strophes in the Book of Job, is almost misled into this groundless reckoning of the strophes according to the Masoretic verses (Jahrb. iii. S. 118, Anm. 3). The strophe-schema of the following speech is as follows: 8. 10. 6. 8. 6. 8. 6. The translation will show how unmistakeably it may be known. In the translation we have followed the complete lines of the original, and their rhythm: the iambic pentameter into which Ebrard, and still earlier Hosse (1849), have translated, disguises the oriental Hebrew poetry of the book with its variegated richness of form in a western uniform, the monotonous impression of which is not, as elsewhere, counter-balanced in the book of Job by the change of external action. After the translation we give the grammatical explanation of each strophe; and at the conclusion of the speech thus translated and explained, its higher exposition, i.e. its artistic importance in the connection of the drama, and its theological importance in relation to the Old and New Testament religion and religious life.

3 Perish the day wherein I was born.

And the night which said, A man-child is conceived!

4 Let that day become darkness;

Let not Eloah ask after it from above,

And let not the light shine on it.

5 May darkness and the shadow of death purchase it back;

Let a cloud lie upon it;

May that which obscures the day terrify it.

The curse is against the day of his birth and the night of his conception as recurring yearly, not against the actual first day (Schlottm.), to which the imprecations which follow are not pertinent. Job wishes his birth-day may become dies ater, swallowed up by darkness as into nothing. The elliptical relative clauses, ver. 3 (Ges. § 123, 3; cf. 127, 4, e), become clear from the translation. Transl. the night (לַיְלָהּ) with parag. He is masc.) which said, not: in which they said; the night alone was witness of this beginning of the development of a man-child, and made report of it to the High One, to whom it is subordinate. Day emerges from the darkness as Eloah from above (as ch. xxxi. 2, 28), i.e. He who reigns over the changes here below, asks after it; interests Himself in His own (דָּרָשׁ). Job wishes his birth-day may not rejoice in this. The relations of this his birth-day are darkness and the shadow of death. These are to redeem it, as, according to the right of kinsmen, family property is redeemed when it has got into a stranger's hands. This is the meaning of נָאֵל (LXX. ἐκλάβοι), not = נָעַל, inquent (Targ.). נִהְרָה is collective, as נִהְרָה, mass of cloud. Instead of בְּמִרְיִי (the Caph of which seems pointed as præpos.), we must read with Ewald (§ 157, a), Olshausen, (§ 187, b), and others, בְּמִרְיִי, after the form חִבְלִי, darkness, dark flashing (vid. on Ps. x. 8), נִשְׁפָּרִי, tapestry, unless we are willing to accept a form of noun without example elsewhere. The word signifies an obscuring, from בְּמִרְיִי, to glow with heat, because the greater the glow the deeper the blackness it leaves behind. All that ever obscures a day is to overtake and render terrible that day.¹

- 6 *That night ! let darkness seize upon it ;
Let it not rejoice among the days of the year ;
Let it not come into the number of the month.*
- 7 *Lo ! let that night become barren ;
Let no sound of gladness come to it.*
- 8 *Let those who curse the day curse it,
Who are skilled in stirring up leviathan.*
- 9 *Let the stars of its early twilight be darkened ;
Let it long for light and there be none ;
And let it not refresh itself with the eyelids of the dawn.*

Darkness is so to seize it, and so completely swallow it up, that it shall not be possible for it to pass into the light of day. It is not to become a day, to be reckoned as belonging to the days of the year and rejoice in the light thereof. יָחַד, for יָחַד, fut. Kal from חָדָה (Ex. xviii. 9), with Dagesh lene retained, and a helping Pathach (vid. Ges. § 75, rem. 3, d); the reverse of the passage Gen. xlix. 6, where יָחַד, from יָחַד, uniat se, is found. It is to become barren, גִּלְמִיד, so that no human being shall ever be conceived and born, and greeted joyfully in it.² "Those who curse days" are magicians who know how to change days into dies infausti by their incantations. According to vulgar superstition, from which the imagery of ver. 8 is borrowed, there was a special art of exciting the dragon, which is the enemy of sun and moon, against them both, so that, by its devouring them, total darkness prevails. The dragon is called in Hindu rāhu; the Chinese, and also the natives of Algeria, even at the present day make a wild tumult with drums and copper vessels when an eclipse of the sun or moon occurs, until the dragon will release his prey.¹ Job wishes that this monster may swallow up the sun of his birth-day. If the night in which he was conceived or born is to become day, then let the stars of its twilight (i.e. the stars which, as messengers of the morning, twinkle through the twilight of dawn) be darkened. It is to remain for ever dark, never behold with delight the eyelids of the dawn. וַיִּרְאֵהוּ, to regale one's self with the sight of anything, refresh one's self. When the first rays of morning shoot up in the eastern sky, then the dawn raises its eyelids; they are in Sophocles' Antigone, 103, χρυσέης ἡμέρας βλέφαρον, the eyelid of the golden day, and therefore of the sun, the great eye.

10 Because it did not close the doors of my mother's womb, Nor hid sorrow from my eyes.

11 *Why did I not die from the womb,
Come forth from the womb and expire?*

12 *Why have the knees welcomed me?
And why the breasts, that I should suck?*

The whole strophe contains strong reason for his cursing the night of his conception or birth. It should rather have closed (i.e. made the womb barren, to be explained according to 1 Sam. i. 5, Gen. xvi. 2) the doors of his womb (i.e. the womb that conceived (concepit) him), and so have withdrawn the sorrow he now experiences from his unborn eyes (on the

A similar custom among the natives of Algeria I have read of in a newspaper (1856). Moreover, the clouds which conceal the sky the Indians represent as a serpent. extended force of the negative, vid. Ges. § 152, 3). Then why, i.e. to what purpose worth the labour, is he then conceived and born? The four questions, vers. 11 sqq., form a climax: he follows the course of his life from its commencement in embryo (מֶרְחֵם, to be explained according to Jer. xx. 17, and ch. x. 18, where, however, it is מן local, not as here, temporal) to the birth, and from the joy of his father who took the new-born child upon his knees (comp. Gen. l. 23) to the first development of the infant, and he curses this growing life in its four phases (Arnh., Schlottm.). Observe the consecutio temp. The fut. אָמִית has the signification morietur, because taken from the thought of the past period of his conception and birth; so also וְאָנִית, governed by the preceding perf., the signification et exspirabam (Ges. § 127, 4, c). Just so אֵינִי, but modal, ut sugerem ea.

- 13 *So should I now have lain and had quiet,
I should have slept, then it would have been well with me,*
14 *With kings and councillors of the earth,
Who built ruins for themselves,*
15 *Or with princes possessing gold,
Who filled their houses with silver:*
16 *Or like a hidden untimely birth I had not been,
And as children that have never seen the light.*

The perf. and interchanging fut. have the signification of oriental imperfecta conjunctivi, according to Ges. § 126, 5; כִּי עָתָה is the usual expression after hypothetical clauses, and takes the perf. if the preceding clause specifies a condition which has not occurred in the past (Gen. xxxi. 42, xliii. 10; Num. xxii. 29, 33; 1 Sam. xiv. 30), the fut. if a condition not existing in the present (ch. vi. 3, viii. 6, xiii. 19). It is not to be translated: for then; כִּי rather commences the conclusion: so I should now, indeed then I should. Ruins, הָרָבֹת, are uninhabited desolate buildings, elsewhere such as have become, here such as are from the first intended to remain, uninhabited and desolate, consequently sepulchres, mausoleums; probably, since the book has Egyptian allusions in other passages also, an allusion to the pyramids, in whose name (III-XPAM, according to Coptic glossaries) III is the Egyptian article (vid. Bunsen, Aeg. ii. 361); Arab. without the art. hirâm or ahrâm (vid. Abdollatif, ed. de Sacy, p. 293, s.).¹ Also Renan: Qui se bâtissent des mausolées. Böttch. de inferis, § 298 (who, however, prefers to read רחבות, wide streets), rightly directs attention to the difference between בנה הרבות (to rebuild the ruins) and בנה ה' לו (to build ruins for one's self). With אן like things are then ranged after one another. Builders of the pyramids, millionaires, abortions (vid. Eccl. vi. 3), and the still-born: all these are removed from the sufferings of this life in their quiet of the grave, be their grave a "ruin" gazed upon by their descendants, or a hole dug out in the earth, and again filled in as it was before.

- 17 *There the wicked cease from troubling,
And the weary are at rest.*
18 *The captives dwell together in tranquillity;
They hear not the voice of the taskmaster.*
19 *The small and great,—they are alike there;
And the servant is free from his lord.*

There, i.e. in the grave, all enjoy the rest they could not find here: the troublers and the troubled ones alike. רָפוּ corresponds to the radical idea of looseness, broken in pieces, want of restraint, therefore of Turba (comp. Isa. lvii. 20, Jer. vi. 7), contained etymologically in רָשַׁע. The Pilel שָׁאֵן (vid. Ges. § 55, 2) signifies perfect freedom from care. In

שָׁם הוּא, is more than the sign of the copula (Hirz., Hahn, Schlottm.); the rendering of the LXX., Vulg., and Luth., ibi sunt, is too feeble. As it is said of God, Isa. xli. 4, xliii. 13, Ps. cii. 28, that He is הוּא, i.e. He who is always the same, ὁ αὐτός; so here, הוּא, used purposely instead of הַמָּוֶה, signifies that great and small are like one another in the grave: all distinction has ceased, it has sunk to the equality of their present lot. Correctly Ewald: Great and small are there the same. יָהִר, ver. 18, refers to this destiny which makes them one.

- 20 *Why is light given to the wretched,
And life to the sorrowful in soul?*
21 *Who wait for death, and he comes not,
Who dig after him more than for treasure,*
22 *Who rejoice with exceeding joy,
Who are enraptured, when they can find the grave?*
23 *To the man whose way is hidden,
And whom Eloah hath hedged round?*

The descriptive partt. vers. 21*a*, 22*a*, are continued in predicative clauses, which are virtually relative clauses; ver. 21*b* has the fut. consec., since the sufferers are regarded as now at last dead; ver. 22*b* the simple fut., since their longing for the grave is placed before the eye (on this transition from the part. to the verb. fin., vid. Ges. § 134, rem. 2). Schlottm. and Hahn wrongly translate: who would dig (instead of do dig) for him more than for treasure. אֶל־יָלִי (with poetical אֶל־ instead of אֶל) might signify, accompanied by rejoicing, i.e. the cry and gesture of joy. The translation usque ad exultationem, is, however, more appropriate here as well as in Hos. ix. 1. With ver. 23 Job refers to himself: he is the man whose way of suffering is mysterious and prospectless, and whom God has penned in on all sides (a fig. like ch. xix. 8; comp. Lam. iii. 5). סָבַךְ, sepire, above, ch. i. 10, to hedge round for protection, here: forcibly straiten.

- 24 *For instead of my food my sighing cometh,
And my roarings pour themselves forth as water.*
25 *For I fear something terrible, and it cometh upon me,
And that before which I shudder cometh to me.*
26 *I dwelt not in security, nor rested, nor refreshed myself:
Then trouble cometh.*

That לִפְנֵי may pass over from the local signification to the substitutionary, like the Lat. pro (e.g. pro præmio est), is seen from ch. iv. 19 (comp. 1 Sam. i. 16): the parallelism, which is less favourable to the interpretation, before my bread (Hahn, Schlottm., and others), favours the signification pro here. The fut. consec. וַיִּתְּכֵנִי (Kal of נָתַתְּ) is to be translated, according to Ges. § 129, 3, a, se effundunt (not effuderunt): it denotes, by close connection with the preceding, that which has hitherto happened. Just so ver. 25*a*: I fear something terrible; forthwith it comes over me (this terrible, most dreadful thing). וַיִּתְּכֵנִי is conjugated by the ה passing into the original ' of the root (vid. Ges. § 74, rem. 4). And just so the conclusion: then also forthwith רָגַזְתִּי (i.e. suffering which disorders, rages and ransacks furiously) comes again. Schlottm. translates tamely and wrongly: then comes—oppression. Hahn, better: Nevertheless fresh trouble always comes; but the “nevertheless” is incorrect, for the fut. consec. indicates a close connection, not contrast. The prætt., ver. 26, give the details of the principal fact, which follows in the fut. consec.: only a short cessation, which is no real cessation; then the suffering rages afresh.

Why—one is inclined to ask respecting this first speech of Job, which gives rise to the following controversy—why does the writer allow Job, who but a short time before, in opposition to his wife, has manifested such wise submission to God’s dealings, all at once to break forth into such despair? Does it not seem as though the assertion of Satan were about to be confirmed? Much depends upon one's forming a correct and just judgment respecting the state of mind from which this first speech proceeds. To this purpose, consider (1) That the speech contains no trace of what the writer means by בָּרַךְ אֶת־הָאֱלֹהִים: Job nowhere says that he will have nothing more to do with God; he does not renounce his former faithfulness: (2) That, however, in the mind of the writer, as may be gathered from ch. ii. 10, this speech is to be regarded as the beginning of Job's sinning. If a man, on account of his sufferings, wishes to die early, or not to have been born at all, he has lost his confidence that God, even in the severest suffering, designs his highest good; and this want of confidence is sin.

There is, however, a great difference between a man who has in general no trust in God, and in whom suffering only makes this manifest in a terrible manner, and the man with whom trust in God is a habit of his soul, and is only momentarily repressed, and, as it were, paralysed. Such interruption of the habitual state may result from the first pressure of unaccustomed suffering; it may then seem as though trust in God were overwhelmed, whereas it has only given way to rally itself again. It is, however, not the greatness of the affliction in itself which shakes his sincere trust in God, but a change of disposition on the part of God which seems to be at work in the affliction. The sufferer considers himself as forgotten, forsaken, and rejected of God, as many passages in the Psalms and Lamentations show: therefore he sinks into despair; and in this despair expression is given to the profound truth (although with regard to the individual it is a sinful weakness), that it is better never to have been born, or to be annihilated, than to be rejected of God (comp. Matt. xxvi. 24, καλὸν ἦν αὐτῷ εἰ οὐκ ἐγεννήθη ὁ ἄνθρωπος ἐκεῖνος). In such a condition of spiritual, and, as we know from the prologue, of Satanic temptation (Luke xxii. 31, Eph. vi. 16), is Job. He does not despair when he contemplates his affliction, but when he looks at God through it, who, as though He were become his enemy, has surrounded him with this affliction as with a rampart. He calls himself a man whose way is hidden, as Zion laments, Isa. xl. 27, "My way is hidden from Jehovah;" a man whom Eloah has hedged round, as Jeremiah laments on the ruins of Jerusalem, Lam. iii. 1-13 (in some measure a comment on Job iii. 23), "I am the man who has seen affliction by the rod of His wrath. . . . He has hedged me round that I cannot get out, and made my chain heavy." In this condition of entire deprivation of every taste of divine goodness, Job breaks forth into curses. He has lost wealth and children, and has praised God; he has even begun to bear an incurable disease with submission to the providence of God. Now, however, when not only the affliction, but God himself, seems to him to be hostile (nunc autem occultato patre, as Brentius expresses it),¹ we hear from his mouth neither words of praise (the highest excellence in affliction) nor words of resignation (duty in affliction), but words of despair: his trust in God is not destroyed, but overcast by thick clouds of melancholy and doubt.

It is indeed inconceivable that a New Testament believer,

even under the strongest temptation, should utter such imprecations, or especially such a question of doubt as in ver. 20: Wherefore is light given to the miserable? But that an Old Testament believer might very easily become involved in such conflicts of belief, may be accounted for by the absence of any express divine revelation to carry his mind beyond the bounds of the present. Concerning the future at the period when the book of Job was composed, and the hero of the book lived, there were longings, inferences, and forebodings of the soul; but there was no clear, consoling word of God on which to rely,—no θεῖος λόγος which, to speak as Plato (Phædo, p. 85, D), could serve as a rescuing plank in the shipwreck of this life. Therefore the πανταχοῦ θρυλλούμενον extends through all the glory and joy of the Greek life from the very beginning throughout. The best thing is never to have been born; the second best, as soon as possible thereafter, to die. The truth, that the suffering of this present time is not worthy of the glory which shall be revealed in us, was still silent. The proper disposition of mind, under such veiling of the future, was then indeed more absolute, as faith committed itself blindfold to the guidance of God. But how near at hand was the temptation to regard a troublous life as an indication of the divine anger, and doubtingly to ask, Why God should send the light of life to such! They knew not that the present lot of man forms but the one half of his history: they saw only in the one scale misery and wrath, and not in the other the heaven of love and blessedness to be revealed hereafter, by which these are outweighed; they longed for a present solution of the mystery of life, because they knew nothing of the possibility of a future solution. Thus it is to be explained, that not only Job in this poem, but also Jeremiah in the book of his prophecy, ch. xx. 14–18, curses the day of his birth. He curses the man who brought his father the joyous tidings of the birth of a son, and wishes him the fate of Sodom and Gomorrha. He wishes for himself that his mother might have been his grave, and asks, like Job, "Wherefore came I forth out of the womb to see labour and sorrow, and that my days should be consumed in shame?" Hitzig remarks on this, that it may be inferred from the contents and form of this passage, there was a certain brief disturbance of spirit, a result of the general indescribable distress of the troublous last days of Zedekiah, to which the spirit of the prophet also succumbed. And it is certainly a kind of delirium in which Jeremiah so speaks, but there is no physical disorder of mind with it: the understanding of the prophet is so slightly and only momentarily disturbed, that he has the rather gained power over his faith, and is himself become one of its disturbing forces.

Without applying to this lyric piece either the standard of pedantic moralizing, or of minute criticism as poetry, the intense melancholy of this extremely plaintive prophet may have proceeded from the following reasoning: After I have lived ten long years of fidelity and sacrifice to my prophetic calling, I see that it has totally failed in its aim: all my hopes are blighted; all my exhortations to repentance, and my prayers, have not availed to draw Judah back from the abyss into which he is now cast, nor to avert the wrath of Jehovah which is now poured forth: therefore it had been better for me never to have been born. This thought affects the prophet so much the more, since in every fibre of his being he is an Israelite, and identifies the weal and woe of his people with his own; just as Moses would rather himself be blotted out from the book of life than that Israel should perish, and Paul was willing to be separated from Christ as anathema if he could thereby save Israel. What wonder that this thought should disburden itself in such imprecations! Had Jeremiah not been born, he would not have had occasion to sit on the ruins of Jerusalem. But his outburst of feeling is notwithstanding a paroxysm of excitement, for, though reason might drive him to despair, faith would teach him to hope even in the midst of downfall; and in reality, this small lyric piece in the collective prophecy of Jeremiah is only as a detached rock, over which, as a stream of clear living water, the prophecy flows on more joyous in faith, more certain of the future. In the book of Job it is otherwise; for what in Jeremiah and several of the psalms is compressed into a small compass,—the darkness of temptation and its clearing up,—is here the substance of a long entanglement dramatically presented, which first of all becomes progressively more and more involved, and to which this outburst of feeling gives the impulse. As Jeremiah, had he not been born, would not have sat on the ruins of Jerusalem; so Job, had he not been born, would not have found himself in this abyss of wrath. Neither of them knows anything of the future solution of every present mystery of life; they know nothing of the future life and the heavenly crown. This it is which, while it justifies their despair, casts greater glory round their struggling faith.

The first speaker among the friends, who now comes forward, is Eliphaz, probably the eldest of them. In the main, they all represent one view, but each with his individual peculiarity: Eliphaz with the self-confident pathos of age, and the mien of a prophet;¹ Bildad with the moderation and caution befitting one poorer in thought; Zophar with an excitable vehemence, neither skilled nor disposed for a lasting contest. The skill of the writer, as we may here at the outset remark, is also manifest in this, that what the friends say, considered in itself, is true: the error lies only in the inadequacy and inapplicability of what is said to the case before them.

SECOND PART.—THE ENTANGLEMENT.

CHAP. IV.—XXVI.

THE FIRST COURSE OF THE CONTROVERSY.—CHAP. IV.—XIV.

Eliphaz' First Speech.—Chap. iv. v.Schema : 8. 12. 11. 11. | 11. 12. 10. 10. 10. 2.

In reply to Sommer, who in his excellent biblische Abhandlungen, 1846, considers the octastich as the extreme limit of the compass of the strophe, it is sufficient to refer to the Syriac strophe-system. It is, however, certainly an impossibility that, as Ewald (Jahrb. ix. 37) remarks with reference to the first speech of Jehovah, ch. xxxviii. xxxix., the strophes can sometimes extend to a length of 12 lines = Masoretic verses, consequently consist of 24 στίχοι and more. [Then Eliphaz the Temanite began, and said :]

- 2 *If one attempts a word with thee, will it grieve thee?
And still to restrain himself from words, who is able?*
- 3 *Behold, thou hast instructed many,
And the weak hands thou hast strengthened.*
- 4 *Thy words upheld the stumbling,
And the sinking knees thou hast strengthened.*
- 5 *But now it cometh to thee, thou art grieved;
Now it toucheth thee, thou despondest.*

The question with which Eliphaz begins, is certainly one of those in which the tone of interrogation falls on the second of the paratactically connected sentences: Wilt thou, if we speak to thee, feel it unbearable? Similar examples are ch. iv. 21, Num. xvi. 22, Jer. viii. 4; and with interrogative Wherefore? Isa. v. 4, l. 2: comp. the similar paratactic union of sentences, ch. ii. 10, iii. 11b. The question arises here, whether נָפַח is an Aramaic form of writing for נָשַׁח (as the Masora in distinction from Deut. iv. 34 takes it), and also either future, Wilt thou, if we raise, i.e. utter, etc.; or passive, as Ewald formerly,¹ If a word is raised, i.e. uttered, נָשַׁח דָּבַר, like נָשַׁח מִשָּׁל, ch. xxvii. 1; or whether it is third pers. Piel, with the signification, attempt, tentare, Eccles. vii. 23. The last is to be preferred, because more natural and also more expressive. נָפַח followed by the fut. is a hypothetic præter., Supposing that, etc., wilt thou, etc., as e.g. ch. xxiii. 10. מְלִין is the Aramaic plur. of מֶלֶךְ, which is more frequent in the book of Job than the Hebrew plur. מְלִים. The futt., vers. 3 sq., because following the perf., are like imperfects in the western languages: the expression is like Isa. xxxv. 3. In נָפַח עַתָּה, ver. 5, נָפַח has a temporal signification, Now when, Ges. § 155, 1, e, (b).

- 6 Is not thy piety thy confidence,
Thy hope? And the uprightness of thy ways?
- 7 Think now: who ever perished, being innocent?!
And where have the righteous been cut off?!
- 8 As often as I saw, those who ploughed evil
And sowed sorrow,—they reaped the same.
- 9 By the breath of Eloah they perished,
By the breath of His anger they vanished away.
- 10 The roaring of the lion, and the voice of the shachal,
And the teeth of the young lions, are rooted out.
- 11 The lion wanders about for want of prey,
And the lioness' whelps are scattered.

In ver. 6 all recent expositors take the last waw as waw

apodosis : And thy hope, is not even this the integrity of thy way? According to our punctuation, there is no occasion for supposing such an application of the waw apodosis, which is an error in a clause consisting only of substantives, and is not supported by the examples, ch. xv. 17, xxiii. 12, 2 Sam. xxii. 41.¹ כְּסִלְתָּךְ is the permutative of the ambiguous כְּסִלְתָּךְ, which, from כָּסַל, to be fat, signifies both the heaviness of stupidity and the boldness of confidence. The addition of הוּא to מִי, ver. 7, like ch. xiii. 19, xvii. 3, makes the question more earnest : quis tandem, like מִי זֶה, quisnam (Ges. § 122, 2). In ver. 8, כִּי־אֶשֶׁר is not comparative, but temporal, and yet so that it unites, as usual, what stands in close connection with, and follows directly upon, the preceding : When, so as, as often as I had seen those who planned and worked out evil (comp. Prov. xxii. 8), I also saw that they reaped it. That the ungodly, and they alone, perish, is shown in vers. 10 sq. under the simile of the lions. The Hebrew, like the oriental languages in general, is rich in names for lions ; the reason of which is, that the lion-tribe, although now become rarer in Asia, and of which only a solitary one is found here and there in the valley of the Nile, was more numerous in the early times, and spread over a wider area.² שִׁחַל, which the old expositors often understood as the panther, is perhaps the maneless lion, which is still found on the lower Euphrates and Tigris. נָחַע = נָחַץ, Ps. lviii. 7, evellere, elidere, by zeugma, applies to the voice also. All recent expositors translate ver. 11 init. wrongly : the lion perishes. The participle אָבַר is a stereotype expression for wandering about prospectless and helpless (Deut. xxvi. 5, Isa. xxvii. 13, Ps. cxix. 176, and freq.). The part., otherwise remarkable here, has its origin in this usage of the language. The parallelism is like Ps. xcii. 10.

¹ We will not, however, dispute the possibility, for at least in Arabic one can say, زيد فحكيم Zeid, he is wise. Grammarians remark that زيد in this instance is like a hypothetical antecedent : If any one asks, etc. 2 Sam. xv. 34 is similar.

² Vid. Schmaarda, Geographische Verbreitung der Thiere, i. 210, where, among other things, we read : The lion in Asia is driven back at almost all points, and also in Africa has been greatly diminished ; for hundreds of lions and panthers were used in the Roman amphitheatres, whilst at the present time it would be impossible to procure so large a number.

- 12 *And to me a word came stealthily,
And my ear heard a whisper thereof.*
13 *In the play of thought from visions of the night,
When deep sleep falleth on men—*
14 *Fear came upon me, and trembling ;
And it caused the multitude of my bones to quake with fear.*
15 *And a breathing passed over my face ;
The hair of my flesh stood up.*
16 *It stood there, and I discerned not its appearance :
An image was before my eyes ;
A gentle murmur and a voice I heard.*

The fut. יִגֵּב, like Judg. ii. 1, Ps. lxxx. 9, is ruled by the following fut. consec.: ad me furtim delatum est (not deferabatur). Eliphaz does not say יִגֵּב אֵלַי (although he means a single occurrence), because he desires, with pathos, to put himself prominent. That the word came to him so secretly, and that he heard only as it were a whisper (שָׁמַעַן, according to Arnheim, in distinction from שָׁמַע, denotes a faint, indistinct impression on the ear), is designed to show the value of such a solemn communication, and to arouse curiosity. Instead of the prosaic כְּמוֹנִי, we find here the poetic pausal-form מְנוּהָ expanded from מְנוּהָ, after the form מְנוּהָ, ch. xxi. 16, Ps. xviii. 23. מְנוּהָ is partitive: I heard only a whisper, murmur; the word was too sacred and holy to come loudly and directly to his ear. It happened, as he lay in the deep sleep of night, in the midst of the confusion of thought resulting from nightly dreams. שְׁעָפִים (from שָׁעָה, branched) are thoughts proceeding like branches from the heart as their root, and intertwining themselves; the מן which follows refers to the cause: there were all manner of dreams which occasioned the thoughts, and to which they referred (comp. ch. xxxiii. 15); תַּרְדֵּמָה, in distinction from שְׁנָה, sleep, and תְּנוּמָה, slumber, is the deep sleep related to death and ecstasy, in which man sinks back from outward life into the remotest ground of his inner life. In ver. 14, קָרָאֵנִי, from קָרָא = קָרָה, to meet (Ges. § 75, 22), is equivalent to קָרַנִּי (not קָרַנִּי, as Hirz., first edition, wrongly points it; comp. Gen. xlv. 29). The subject of הַפְּתִיר is the undiscerned ghostlike something. Eliphaz was stretched upon his bed when רוּחַ, a breath of wind, passed (תָּלַף, similar to Isa. xxi. 1) over his face. The wind is the element by means of which the spirit-existence is made manifest; comp. 1 Kings xix. 12, where Jehovah appears in a gentle whispering of the wind, and Acts ii. 2, where the descent of the Holy Spirit is made known by a mighty rushing. רוּחַ, πνεῦμα, Sanscrit âtma, signifies both the immaterial spirit and the air, which is proportionately the most immaterial of material things.¹ His hair bristled up, even every hair of his body; כַּפִּיר, not causative, but intensive of Kal. יַעֲמֹד has also the ghostlike appearance as subject. Eliphaz could not discern its outline, only a תְּמוּנָה, imago quædam (the most ethereal word for form, Num. xii. 8, Ps. xvii. 15, of μορφή or δόξα of God), was before his eyes, and he heard, as it were proceeding from it, וְקוֹל, דִּמְמָה וְקוֹל, i.e. per hendiadyn: a voice, which spoke to him in a gentle, whispering tone, as follows:

17 "Is a mortal just before Eloah,

Or a man pure before his Maker?

18 Behold, He trusteth not His servants!

And His angels He chargeth with imperfection—

- 19 *How much more those who dwell in houses of clay, Whose origin is in the dust!
They are crushed as though they were moths.*
- 20 *From morning until evening,—so are they broken in pieces:
Unobserved they perish for ever.*
- 21 *Is it not so: the cord of their tent in them is torn away,
So they die, and not in wisdom?"*

The question arises whether מִן is comparative: præ Deo, on which Mercier with penetration remarks: justior sit oportet qui immerito affligitur quam qui immerito affligit; or causal: a Deo, h.e., ita ut a Deo justificetur. All modern expositors rightly decide on the latter. Hahn justly maintains that עַם and בְּעֵינַי are found in a similar connection in other places; and ch. xxxii. 2 is perhaps not to be explained in any other way, at least that does not restrict the present passage. By the servants of God, none but the angels, mentioned in the following line of the verse, are intended. שָׁמַיִם with בְּ signifies imputare (1 Sam. xxii. 15); in ch. xxiv. 12 (comp. i. 22) we read תַּפְּלָה, absurditatem (which Hupf. wishes to restore even here), joined with the verb in this signification. The form תַּפְּלָה is certainly not to be taken as stultitia from the verb תַּלַּל; the half vowel, and still less the absence of the Dagesh, will not allow this. תִּנּוּ (Olsh. § 213, c), itself uncertain in its etymology, presents no available analogy. The form points to a Lamedh-He verb, as תִּרְמָה from רָמָה, so perhaps from תַּלַּה, Niph. נִתְּלָה, remotus, Micah iv. 7: being distant, being behind the perfect, difference; or even from תַּלַּה (Targ. תַּלַּה, Pa. תַּלִּי) = תַּלַּה, weakness, want of strength.¹ Both significations will do, for it is not meant that the good spirits positively sin, as if sin were a natural necessary consequence of their creatureship and finite existence, but that even the holiness of the good spirits is never equal to the absolute holiness of God, and that this deficiency is still greater in spirit-corporeal man, who has earthiness as the basis of his original nature. At the same time, it is presupposed that the distance between God and created earth is disproportionately greater than between God and created spirit, since matter is destined to be exalted to the nature of the spirit, but also brings the spirit into the danger of being degraded to its own level.

Ver. 19. הַאֲנִי כִּי signifies, like הַאֲנִי כִּי , quanto minus, or quanto magis, according as a negative or positive sentence precedes: since 18b is positive, we translate it here quanto magis, as 2 Sam. xvi. 11. Men are called dwellers in clay houses: the house of clay is their $\phi\theta\alpha\rho\tau\acute{o}\nu\ \sigma\acute{\omega}\mu\alpha$, as being taken de limo terræ (ch. xxxiii. 6; comp. Wisdom ix. 15); it is a fragile habitation, formed of inferior materials, and destined to destruction. The explanation which follows—those whose יְסוֹד , i.e. foundation of existence, is in dust—shows still more clearly that the poet has Gen. ii. 7, iii. 19, in his mind. It crushes them (subject, everything that operates destructively on the life of man) לִפְנֵי-עֵשׂ , i.e. not: sooner than the moth is crushed (Hahn), or more rapidly than a moth destroys (Oehler, Fries), or even appointed to the moth for destruction (Schlottom.); but לִפְנֵי signifies, as ch. iii. 24 (cf. 1 Sam. i. 16), ad instar: as easily as a moth is crushed. They last only from morning until evening: thus they are broken in pieces (הִבַּח , from בָּתַח , for הִבַּחַת); they are therefore as ephemeræ. They perish for ever, without any one taking it to heart (suppl. עַל-לֵב , Isa. xlii. 25, lvii. 1), or directing the heart towards it, animum advertit (suppl. לֵב , ch. i. 8).

Eccl. xii. 6, with a silver cord, which holds the lamp hanging from the covering of the tent. Olshausen is inclined to read יִתְרָם, their tent-pole, instead of יִתְרָם, and at any rate thinks the accompanying בָּם superfluous and awkward. But (1) the comparison used here of the soul, and of the life sustained by it, corresponds to its comparison elsewhere with a thread or weft, of which death is the cutting through or loose (ch. vi. 9, xxvii. 8; Isa. xxxviii. 12); (2) בָּם is neither superfluous nor awkward, since it is intended to say, that their duration of life falls in all at once like a tent when that which in them (בָּם) corresponds to the cord of a tent (i.e. the נֶפֶשׁ) is drawn away from it. The relation of the members of the sentence in ver. 21 is just the same as in ver. 2: Will they not die when it is torn away, etc. They then die off in lack of wisdom, i.e. without having acted in accordance with the perishableness of their nature and their distance from God; therefore, rightly considered: unprepared and suddenly, comp. ch. xxxvi. 12, Prov. v. 23. Oehler, correctly: without having been made wiser by the afflictions of God. The utterance of the spirit voice, the compass of which is unmistakeably manifest by the strophic division, ends here. Eliphaz now, with reference to it, turns to Job.

Ch. v. 1 Call now,—is there any one who will answer thee?

And to whom of the holy ones wilt thou turn?

2 *For he is a fool who is destroyed by complaining,
And envy slays the simple one.*

3 *I, even I, have seen a fool taking root:
Then I had to curse his habitation suddenly.*

4 *His children were far from help,
And were crushed in the gate, without a rescuer;*

5 *While the hungry ate his harvest,
And even from among thorns they took it away,
And the intriguer snatched after their wealth.*

The chief thought of the oracle was that God is the absolutely just One, and infinitely exalted above men and angels. Resuming his speech from this point, Eliphaz tells Job that no cry for help can avail him unless he submits to the all-just One as being himself unrighteous; nor can any cry addressed to the angels avail. This thought, although it is rejected, certainly shows that the writer of the book, as of the prologue, is impressed with the fundamental intuition, that good, like evil, spirits are implicated in the affairs of men; for the "holy ones," as in Ps. lxxxix., are the angels. וְ supports the negation implied in ver. 1: If God does not help thee, no creature can help thee; for he who complains and chafes at his lot brings down upon himself the extremest destruction, since he excites the anger of God still more. Such a surly murmurer against God is here called אִשָּׁר. אִ is the Aramaic sign of the object, having the force of quod attinet ad, quoad (Ew. § 310, a).

Eliphaz justifies what he has said (ver. 2) by an example. He had seen such a complainer in increasing prosperity; then he cursed his habitation suddenly, i.e. not: he uttered forthwith a prophetic curse over it, which, though פִּתְאֻם might have this meaning (not subito, but illico; cf. Num. xii. 4), the following futt., equivalent to imperff., do not allow, but: I had then, since his discontent had brought on his destruction, suddenly to mark and abhor his habitation as one overtaken by a curse: the cursing is a recognition of the divine curse, as the echo of which it is intended. This curse of God manifests itself also on his children and his property (vers. 4 sqq.). שַׁעַר is the gate of the city as a court of justice: the phrase, to oppress in the gate, is like Prov. xxii. 22; and the form Hithpa. is according to the rule given in Ges. § 54, 2, b. The relative אֲשֶׁר, ver. 5, is here conj. relativa, according to Ges. § 155, 1, e. In the connection אֶל-מִצְנִים, אֶל is equivalent to עַל, adeo e spinis, the hungry fall so eagerly upon what the father of those now orphans has reaped, that even the thorny fence does not hold them back. צַיִם, as Prov. xxii. 5: the double præpos. אֶל-כֵּן is also found elsewhere, but with another meaning. צַיִם has only the appearance of being plur.: it is sing. after the form צַיִק, from the verb צָמַם, nectere, and signifies, ch. xviii. 9, a snare; here, however, not judicii laqueus (Böttch.), but what, besides the form, is still more natural: the snaremaker, intriguer. The Targ. translates לְסַמֵּימִין, i.e. λησται. Most modern critics (Rosenm. to Ebr.) translate: the thirsty (needy), as do all the old translations, except the Targ.; this, however, is not possible without changing the form. The meaning is, that intriguing persons catch up (שָׁאֵף, as Amos ii. 7) their wealth.

Eliphaz now tells why it thus befell this fool in his own person and his children.

- 6 *For evil cometh not forth from the dust,
And sorrow sprouteth not from the earth—*
- 7 *No, indeed! man is born to sorrow,
As the sparks fly upward.*
- 8 *On the contrary, I would earnestly approach unto God,
And commit my cause to the Godhead;*
- 9 *To Him who doeth great things and unsearchable;
Marvellous things till there is no number:*
- 10 *Who giveth rain over the earth,
And causeth water to flow over the fields:*
- 11 *To set the low in high places;
And those that mourn are exalted to prosperity.*

As the oracle above, so Eliphaz says here, that a sorrowful life is allotted to man,¹ so that his wisdom consequently consists in accommodating himself to his lot: if he does not do that, he is an אֵוִל, and thereby perishes. Misfortune does not grow out of the ground like weeds; it is rather established in the divine order of the world, as it is established in the order of nature that sparks of fire should ascend. The old critics understood by בְּנֵי רֶשֶׁף birds of prey, as being swift as lightning (with which the appellation of beasts of prey may be compared, ch. xxviii. 8, xli. 26); but רֶשֶׁף signifies also a flame or blaze (Cant. viii. 6). Children of the flame is an appropriate name for sparks, and flying upwards is naturally peculiar to sparks as to birds of prey; wherefore among modern expositors, Hirz., Ew., Hahn, von Gerl., Ebr., rightly decide in favour of sparks. Schlottmann understands "angels" by children of flame; but the wings, which are given to angels in Scripture, are only a symbol of their freedom of motion. This remarkable interpretation is altogether opposed to the sententious character of ver. 7, which symbolizes a moral truth by an ordinary thing. The waw in וּבְנֵי, which we have translated "as," is the so-called waw adæquationis proper to the Proverbs, and also to emblems, e.g. Prov. xxv. 25.

Eliphaz now says what he would do in Job's place. Ew. and Ebr. translate incorrectly, or at least unnecessarily: Nevertheless I will. We translate, according to Ges. § 127, 5: Nevertheless I would; and indeed with an emphatic I: Nevertheless I for my part. וְרֵשׁ with אֵל is constr. prægnans, like Deut. xii. 5, sedulo adire. דְּבָרָה is not speech, like אִמְרָה, but cause, causa, in a judicial sense. אֵל is God as the Mighty One; אֱלֹהִים is God in the totality of His variously manifested nature. The fecundity of the earth by rain, and of the fields (חַצְצוֹת = rura) by water-springs (cf. Ps. civ. 10), as the works of God, are intentionally made prominent. He who makes the barren places fruitful, can also change suffering into joy. To His power in nature corresponds His power among men (ver. 11). לְשֵׁם is here only as a variation for הַשֵּׁם, as Heiligs!.

rightly observes: it is equivalent to collocaturus, or qui in eo est ut collocet, according to the mode of expression discussed in Ges. § 132, rem. 1, and more fully on Hab. i. 17. The construction of ver. 11*b* is still bolder. שָׁנִיב signifies to be high and steep, inaccessible. It is here construed with the acc. of motion: those who go in dirty, black clothes because they mourn, shall be high in prosperity, i.e. come to stand on an unapproachable height of prosperity.

- 12 *Who bringeth to nought the devices of the crafty,
So that their hands cannot accomplish anything;*
- 13 *Who catcheth the wise in their craftiness;
And the counsel of the cunning is thrown down.*
- 14 *By day they run into darkness,
And grope in the noon-day as in the night.*
- 15 *He rescueth from the sword, that from their mouth,
And from the hand of the strong, the needy.*
- 16 *Hope ariseth for the weak,
And folly shall close its mouth.*

All these attributes are chosen designedly: God brings down all haughtiness, and takes compassion on those who need it. The noun תְּשִׁיבָה, coined by the Chokma, and out of Job and Proverbs found only in Mic. vi. 9, Isa. xxviii. 29, and even there in gnomic connection, is formed from תָּשׁ, essentia, and signifies as it were essentialitas, realitas: it denotes, in relation to all visible things, the truly existing, the real, the objective; true wisdom (i.e. knowledge resting on an objective actual basis), true prosperity, real profiting and accomplishing. It is meant that they accomplish nothing that has actual duration and advantage. Ver. 13*a* cannot be better translated than by Paul, 1 Cor. iii. 19, who here deviates from the LXX. With נִמְקָהָה, God's seizure, which prevents the contemplated achievement, is to be thought of. He pours forth over the worldly wise what the prophets call the spirit of deep sleep (תִּרְדָּמָה) and of dizziness (עֵוָעִים). On the other hand, He helps the poor. In מַחֲרֵב מִפִּיהֶם the second מֵן is local: from the sword which proceeds from their mouth (comp. Ps. lxiv. 4, lvii. 5, and other passages). Böttch. translates: without sword, i.e. instrument of power (comp. ch. ix. 15, xxi. 9); but מֵן with חֲרֵב leads one to expect that that from which one is rescued is to be described (comp. ver. 20). Ewald corrects מַחֲרֵב, which Olsh. thinks acute: it is, however, unhebraic, according to our present knowledge of the usage of the language; for the passives of חֲרֵב are used of cities, countries, and peoples, but not of individual men. Olsh., in his hesitancy, arrives at no opinion. But the text is sound and beautiful. עֲלָתָהּ with pathetic unaccented ah (Ges. § 80, rem. 2, f), from עוֹלָה = עוֹלָה, as Ps. xcii. 16 Chethib.

So despise not the chastening of the Almighty!

18 For He woundeth, and He also bindeth up;

He bruiseeth, and His hands make whole.

19 In six troubles He will rescue thee,

And in seven no evil shall touch thee.

20 In famine He will redeem thee from death,

And in war from the stroke of the sword.

21 When the tongue scourgeth, thou shalt be hidden;

And thou shalt not fear destruction when it cometh.

The speech of Eliphaz now becomes persuasive as it turns towards the conclusion. Since God humbles him who exalts himself, and since He humbles in order to exalt, it is a happy thing when He corrects (הוֹכִיחַ) us by afflictive dispensations; and His chastisement (מִיָּסָר) is to be received not with a turbulent spirit, but resignedly, yea joyously: the same thought as Prov. iii. 11-13, Ps. xciv. 12, in both passages borrowed from this; whereas ver. 18 here, like Hos. vi. 1, Lam. iii. 31 sqq., refers to Deut. xxxii. 39. רָפָא, to heal, is here conjugated like a ל"ה verb (Ges. § 75, rem. 21). Ver. 19 is formed after the manner of the so-called number-proverbs (Prov. vi. 16, xxx. 15, 18), as also the roll of the judgment of the nations in Amos i. ii.: in six troubles, yea in still more than six. לַע is the extremity that is perhaps to be feared. In ver. 20, the præt. is a kind of prophetic præt. The scourge of the tongue recalls the similar promise, Ps. xxxi. 21, where, instead of scourge, it is: the disputes of the tongue. שׂוֹר, from שָׂרַר, violence, disaster, is allied in sound with שׁוֹט. Isaiah has this passage of the book of Job in his memory when he writes ch. xxviii. 15. The promises of Eliphaz now continue to rise higher, and sound more delightful and more glorious.

22 *At destruction and famine thou shalt laugh,
And from the beasts of the earth thou hast nothing to fear.*

23 *For thou art in league with the stones of the field,
And the beasts of the field are at peace with thee.*

24 *And thou knowest that peace is thy pavilion;
And thou searchest thy household, and findest nothing wanting.*

25 *Thou knowest also that thy seed shall be numerous,
And thy offspring as the herb of the ground.*

26 *Thou shalt come to thy grave in a ripe age,
As shocks of corn are brought in in their season.*

27 *Lo! this we have searched out, so it is:
Hear it, and give thou heed to it.*

The verb שָׁחַק is construed (ver. 22) with לְ of that which is despised, as ch. xxxix. 7, 18, xli. 21 [Hebr.]. אֶל-תִּירָא is the form of subjective negation [vid. Ges. § 152, 1: TR.]: only fear thou not = thou hast no occasion. In ver. 23, בְּרִיתְךָ is the shortest substantive form for בְּרִית לָךְ. The whole of nature will be at peace with thee: the stones of the field, that they do not injure the fertility of thy fields; the wild beasts of the field, that they do not hurt thee and thy herds. The same promise that Hosea (ch. ii. 20) utters in reference to the last days is here used individually. From this we see how deeply the Chokma had searched into the history of Paradise and the Fall. Since man, the appointed lord of the earth, has been tempted by a reptile, and has fallen by a tree, his relation to nature, and its relation to him, has been reversed: it is an incongruity, which is again as a whole put right (שָׁלוֹם), as the false relation of man to God is put right. In ver. 24, שָׁלוֹם (which might also be adj.) is predicate: thou wilt learn (וְיָדַעְתָּ, præter. consec. with accented ultima, as e.g. Deut. iv. 39, here with Tiphcha initiale s. antierius, which does not indicate the grammatical tone-syllable) that thy tent is peace, i.e. in a condition of contentment and peace on all sides. Ver. 24b is to be arranged: And when thou examinest thy household, then thou lackest nothing, goest not astray, i.e. thou findest everything, without missing anything, in the place where thou seekest it.

Ver. 25 reminds one of the Salomonic Ps. lxxii. 16 מְבֹשֶׁמֶת in the Old Testament is found only in Isaiah and the book of Job. The meaning of the noun בְּלָה, which occurs only here and ch. xxx. 2, is clear. Referring to the verb בָּלָה, Arabic قَلَّ (قَلَّ), to be shrivelled up, very aged, it signifies the maturity of old age,—an idea which may be gained more easily if we connect בְּלָה with בָּלָה (to be completed), like קָשָׁה with קָשָׁה (to be hard).¹ In the parallel there is the time of the sheaves, when they are brought up to the high threshing-floor, the latest period of harvest. עֲלָה, of the raising of the sheaves to the threshing-floor, as elsewhere of the raising, i.e. the bringing up of the animals to the altar.

¹ We may also compare the Arabic كَهْل (from which comes cuhulje, mature manhood, opp. tufulje, tender childhood).

נָדִישׁ is here a heap of sheaves, נָדִישׁ, as ch. xxi. 32, a sepulchral heap, גִּדָּת, distinct from אֶלְמָה, a bundle, a single sheaf.

The speech of Eliphaz, which we have broken up into nine strophes, is now ended. Eliphaz concludes it by an epimythionic distich, ver. 27, with an emphatic nota bene. He speaks at the same time in the name of his companions. These are principles well proved by experience with which he confronts Job. Job needs to lay them to heart: tu scito tibi.

All that Eliphaz says, considered in itself, is blameless. He censures Job's vehemence, which was certainly not to be approved. He says that the destroying judgment of God never touches the innocent, but certainly the wicked; and at the same time expresses the same truth as that placed as a motto to the Psalter in Ps. i., and which is even brilliantly confirmed in the issue of the history of Job. If we read in Isa. lvii. 1, comp. Ps. xii. 2, in apparent opposition to this, הַצִּדִּיק אָבֵר, it is not meant that the judgment of destruction comes upon the righteous, but that his generation experiences the judgment of his loss (ætati suæ perit). And these are eternal truths, that between the Creator and creature, even an angel, there remains an infinite distance, and that no creature possesses a righteousness which it can maintain before God. Not less true is it, that with God murmuring is death, and that it is appointed to sinful man to pass through sorrow. Moreover, the counsel of Eliphaz is the right counsel: I would turn to God, etc. His beautiful concluding exhortation, so rich in promises, crowns his speech.

It has been observed (e.g. by Löwenthal), that if it is allowed that Eliphaz (ch. v. 17 sqq.) expresses a salutary spiritual design of affliction, all coherence in the book is from the first destroyed. But in reality it is an effect producing not only outward happiness, but also an inward holiness, which Eliphaz ascribes to sorrow. It is therefore to be asked, how it consists with the plan of the book. There is no doctrinal error to be discovered in the speech of Eliphaz, and yet he cannot be considered as a representative of the complete truth of Scripture. Job ought to humble himself under this; but since he does not, we must side with Eliphaz.

He does not represent the complete truth of Scripture: for there are, according to Scripture, three kinds of sufferings, which must be carefully distinguished.¹ The godless one, who has fallen away from God, is visited with suffering from God; for sin and the punishment of sin (comprehended even in the language in עָנַן and חַטָּאת) are necessarily connected as cause and effect. This suffering of the godless is the effect of the divine justice in punishment; it is chastisement (מוֹסָר) under the disposition of wrath (Ps. vi. 2, xxxviii. 2; Jer. x. 24 sqq.), though not yet final wrath; it is punitive suffering (נִקְמָה, גִּנָּע, τιμωρία, pœna). On the other hand, the sufferings of the righteous flow from the divine love, to which even all that has the appearance of wrath in this suffering must be subservient, as the means only by which it operates: for although the righteous man is not excepted from the weakness and sinfulness of the human race, he can never become an object of the divine wrath, so long as his inner life is directed towards God, and his outward life is governed by the most earnest striving after sanctification. According to the Old and New Testaments, he stands towards God in the relation of a child to his father (only the New Testament idea includes the mystery of the new birth not revealed in the Old Testament); and consequently all sufferings are fatherly chastisements, Deut. viii. 5, Prov. iii. 12, Heb. xii. 6, Apoc. iii. 19, comp. Tob. xii. 13 (Vulg.). But this general distinction between the sufferings of the righteous and of the ungodly is not sufficient for the book of Job. The sufferings of the righteous even are themselves manifold. God sends affliction to them more and more to purge away the sin which still has power over them, and rouse them up from the danger of carnal security; to maintain in them the consciousness of sin as well as of grace, and with it the lowliness of penitence; to render the world and its pleasures bitter as gall to them; to draw them from the creature, and bind them to himself by prayer and devotion. This suffering, which has the sin of the godly as its cause, has, however, not God's wrath, but God's love directed towards the preservation and advancement of the godly, as its motive: it is the proper disciplinary suffering (מוֹסָר or תּוֹכַחַת, Prov. iii. 11; paideia, Heb. xii.). It is this of which Paul speaks, 1 Cor. xi. 32. This disciplinary suffering may attain such a high degree as entirely to overwhelm the consciousness of the relation to God by grace; and the sufferer, as frequently in the Psalms, considers himself as one rejected of God, over whom the wrath of God is passing. The deeper the sufferer's consciousness of sin, the more dejected is his mood of sorrow; and still God's thoughts concerning him are thoughts of peace, and not of evil (Jer. xxix. 11). He chastens, not however in wrath, but בְּמִשְׁפָּט, with moderation (Jer. x. 24).

Nearly allied to this suffering, but yet, as to its cause and purpose, distinct, is another kind of the suffering of the godly. God ordains suffering for them, in order to prove their fidelity to himself, and their earnestness after sanctification, especially their trust in God, and their patience. He also permits Satan, who impeaches them, to tempt them, to sift them as wheat, in order that he may be confounded, and the divine choice justified,—in order that it may be manifest that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, are able to separate them from the love of God, and to tear away their faith (אמונה) from God, which has remained steadfast on Him, notwithstanding every apparent manifestation of wrath. The godly will recognise his affliction as such suffering when it comes upon him in the very midst of his fellowship with God, his prayer and watching, and his struggling after sanctification. For this kind of suffering—trial—Scripture employs the expressions נִסָּה (Deut. viii. 2, 16) and נִבְּחָ (Prov. xvii. 3), πειρασμός (Jas. i. 12; 1 Pet. i. 6 sq., iv. 19; comp. Sir. ii. 1 sqq.). Such suffering, according to a common figure, is for the godly what the smelting-furnace or the fining-pot is to precious metals. A rich reward awaits him who is found proof against the trial, temptation, and conflict, and comes forth from it as pure, refined gold. Suffering for trial is nearly allied to that for chastisement, in so far as the chastisement is at the same time trial; but distinct from it, in so far as every trial is not also chastisement (i.e. having as its purpose the purging away of still existing sin).

A third kind of the suffering of the righteous is suffering borne as testimony,—reproach, persecution, and perhaps even martyrdom, which are endured for the sake of fidelity to God and His word. While he is blessed who is found proof against trial, he is blessed in himself who endures this suffering (Matt. v. 11 sq., and other passages); for every other suffering comes upon man for his own sake, this for God's. In this case there is not even the remotest connection between the suffering and the sinfulness of the sufferer. Ps. xlv. is a prayer of Israel in the midst of this form of suffering. Σταυρός is the name expressly used for it in the New Testament—suffering for the kingdom of heaven's sake.

Without a knowledge of these different kinds of human suffering, the book of Job cannot be understood. "Whoever sees with spiritual eyes," says Brentius, "does not judge the moral character of a man by his suffering, but his suffering by his moral character." Just the want of this spiritual discernment and inability to distinguish the different kinds of suffering is the mistake of the friends, and likewise, from the very first, the mistake of Eliphaz. Convinced of the sincere piety of his friend, he came to Job believing that his suffering was a salutary chastisement of God, which would at last turn out for his good. Proceeding upon this assumption, he blames Job for his murmuring, and bids him receive his affliction with a recognition of human sinfulness and the divine purpose for good. Thus the controversy begins. The causal connection with sin, in which Eliphaz places Job's suffering, is after all the mildest. He does not go further than to remind Job that he is a sinner, because he is a man.

But even this causal connection, in which Eliphaz connects Job's sufferings, though in the most moderate way, with previous sin deserving of punishment, is his πρώτον ψεύδος. Job's suffering, according to the chief purpose of God, is not chastisement, but trial. Jehovah has decreed it for His servant, not to chasten him, but to prove him. This it is that Eliphaz mistakes; and we also should not know it but for the prologue and the corresponding epilogue. Accordingly, the prologue and epilogue are organic parts of the form of the book. If these are removed, its spirit is destroyed.

But the speech of Eliphaz, moreover, beautiful and true as it is, when considered in itself, is nevertheless heartless, haughty, stiff, and cold. For (1.) it does not contain a word of sympathy, and yet the suffering which he beholds is so terribly great: his first word to his friend after the seven days of painful silence is not one of comfort, but of moralizing. (2.) He must know that Job's disease is not the first and only suffering which has come upon him, and that he has endured his previous afflictions with heroic submission; but he ignores this, and acts as though sorrow were now first come upon Job. (3.) Instead of recognising therein the reason of Job's despondency, that he thinks that he has fallen from the love of God, and become an object of wrath, he treats him as self-righteous;¹ and to excite his feelings, presents an oracle to him, which contains nothing but what Job might sincerely admit as true. (4.) Instead of considering that Job's despair and murmuring against God is really of a different kind from that of the godless, he classes them together, and instead of gently correcting him, presents to Job the accursed end of the fool, who also murmurs against God, as he has himself seen it. Thus, in consequence of the false application which Eliphaz makes of it, the truth contained in his speech is totally reversed. Thus delicately and profoundly commences the dramatical entanglement. The skill of the poet is proved by the difficulty which the expositor has in detecting that which is false in the speech of Eliphaz. The idea of the book does not float on the surface. It is clothed with flesh and blood. It is submerged in the very action and history.

Job's First Answer.—Chap. vi. vii.

Schema : 7. 6. 7. 6. 8. 6. 6. 8. 6. | 6. 7. 11. 10. 6. 8.

[Then began Job, and said:]

- 2 *Oh that my vexation were but weighed,
And they would put my suffering in the balance against it!*
- 3 *Then it would be heavier than the sand of the sea :
Therefore my words are rash.*
- 4 *The arrows of the Almighty are in me,
The burning poison whereof drinketh up my spirit ;

¹ Oetinger: "Eliphaz mentioned the oracle to affect seriously the hidden hypocrisy of Job's heart."

Vexation (פֶּעַשׁ) is what Eliphaz has reproached him with (ch. v. 2). Job wishes that his vexation were placed in one scale and his הִיָּה (Keri הִיָּה) in the other, and weighed together (יַחַד). The noun הִיָּה (הִיָּה), from הָיָה (הָיָה), flare, hiare, signifies properly hiatus, then vorago, a yawning gulf, χάσμα, then some dreadful calamity (vid. Hupfeld on Ps. v. 10). נָשָׂא, like נָטַל, Isa. xl. 15, to raise the balance, as pendere, to let it hang down; attollant instead of the passive. This is his desire; and if they but understood the matter, it would then be manifest (בִּי-עֲתָה) as ch. iii. 13, which see), or: indeed then would it be manifest (בִּי certainly in this inferential position has an affirmative signification: vid. Gen. xxvi. 22, xxix. 32, and comp. 1 Sam. xxv. 34, 2 Sam. ii. 27) that his suffering is heavier than the unmeasurable weight of the sand of the sea. יִכְבֹּד is neuter with reference to וְהִיָּתִי לָעַי, with the tone on the penult., which is not to be accounted for by the rhythm as in Ps. xxxvii. 20, cxxxvii. 7, cannot be derived from לָעַה, but only from לָוַע, not however in the signification to suck down, but from לָוַע = לָעַה, Arab. لَغَى or also لَغَا, temere loqui, inania effutire,—a signification which suits excellently here.¹ His words are like those of one in delirium. הִמָּתָם is to be explained according to Ps. xxxviii. 3; הִמָּתָם, according to Ps. vii. 15. יַעֲרֹכֵנִי is short for מִלְחָמָה עָלַי, they make war against me, set themselves in battle array against me. Böttcher, without brachylogy: they cause me to arm myself, put one of necessity on the defensive, which does not suit the subject. The terrors of God strike down all defence. The wrath of God is irresistible. The sting of his suffering, however, is the wrath of God which his spirit drinks as a draught of poison (comp. ch. xxi. 20), and consequently wrings from him, even from his deepest soul, the thought that God is become his enemy: therefore his is an endless suffering, and therefore is it that he speaks so despondingly.

5 Doth the wild ass bray at fresh grass?

Or loweth an ox over good fodder?

6 Is that which is tasteless eaten unsalted?

Or is there flavour in the white of an egg?

7 That which my soul refused to touch,

The same is as my loathsome food.

The meaning of the first two figures is: He would not complain, if there were really no cause for it; of the two others: It is not to be expected that he should smile at his suffering, and enjoy it as delicate food. עַל-בָּלִיל I have translated "over good fodder," for בָּלִיל is mixed fodder of different kinds of grain, farrago. "Without salt" is virtually adjective to תַּפִּל, insipid, tasteless. What is without salt one does not relish, and there is no flavour in the slime of the yolk of an egg, i.e. the white of an egg (Targ.),¹ or in the slime of purslain (according to Chalmetho in the Peschito, Arab. حُمَّاءُ fatua = purslain), which is less probable on account of רִיר (slime, not: broth): there is no flavour so that it can be enjoyed. Thus is it with his sufferings. Those things which he before inwardly detested (dirt and dust of leprosy) are now sicut fastidiosa cibi mei, i.e. as loathsome food which he must eat. The first clause, ver. 7a, must be taken as an elliptic relative clause forming the subject: vid.

¹ Saadia compares b. Aboda zara, 40, a, where it is given as a mark of the purity of the eggs in the roe of fish: חלבון מבחוץ וחלמון מבפנים, when the white is outside and the yellow within.

Ges. § 123, 3, c. Such disagreeable counsel is now like his unclean, disgusting diet. Eliphaz desires him to take them as agreeable. רָוִי in בְּרָוִי is taken by Ges., Ew., Hahn, Schlottm., Olsh. (§ 165, b), as constr. from רָוִי , sickness, filth; but רָוִי , as plur. from רָוָה , sick, unclean (especially of female menstruation, Isa. xxx. 22), as Heiligst. among modern commentators explains it, is far more suitable. Hitz. (as anonym. reviewer of Ewald's Job in the liter. Centralblatt) translates: they (my sufferings) are the morsels of my food; but the explanation of הַפֶּה is not correct, nor is it necessary to go to the Arabic for an explanation of בְּרָוִי . It is also unnecessary, with Böttcher, to read בְּרָוִי (such is my food in accordance with my disease); Job does not here speak of his diet as an invalid.

- 8 *Would that my request were fulfilled,
And that Eloah would grant my expectation,*
9 *That Eloah were willing and would crush me,
Let loose His hand and cut me off:*
10 *Then my comfort would ever be—
(I should exult in unsparing pain)—
That I have not disowned the words of the Holy One.*

His wish refers to the ending of his suffering by death. Hupfeld prefers to read וְתִאֲחַזֵּנִי instead of וְתִקְוֵנִי (ver. 8*b*); but death, which he desires, he even indeed expects. This is just the paradox, that not life, but death, is his expectation. "Cut me off," i.e. my soul or my life, my thread of life (ch. xxvii. 8; Isa. xxxviii. 12). The optative מִי יִהְיֶה (Ges. § 136, 1) is followed by optative futt., partly of the so-called jussive form, as יֵאָל , velit (Hiph. from וָאָל , velle), and יִתֵּר , solvat (Hiph. from נָתַר). In the phrase הִתִּיר יָד , the stretching out of the hand is regarded as the loosening of what was hitherto bound. The conclusion begins with וְתִהְיֶה , just like ch. xiii. 5. But it is to be asked whether by consolation speedy death is to be understood, and the clause with בִּי gives the ground of his claim for the granting of the wish,—or whether he means that just this: not having disowned the words of the Holy One (comp. ch. xxiii. 11 sq., and אִמְרֵי־יְיָ in the mouth of Balaam, the non-Israelitish prophet, Num. xxiv. 4, 16), would be his consolation in the midst of death. With Hupfeld we decide in favour of the latter, with Ps. cxix. 50 in view: this consciousness of innocence is indeed throughout the whole book Job's shield and defence. If, however, נִהַמְתִּי (with Kametz impurum) points towards בִּי, quod, etc., the clause וַאֲסִלְּדָהּ is parenthetical. The cohortative is found thus parenthetical with a conjunctive sense also elsewhere (Ps. xl. 6, li. 18). Accordingly: my comfort—I would exult, etc.—would be that I, etc. The meaning of סָלַד, tripudiare, is confirmed by the LXX. ἡλλόμην, in connection with the Arabic صَلَدَ (of a galloping horse which stamps hard with its fore-feet), according to which the Targ. also translates וַאֲבִינֵי (I will rejoice).¹ For לֹא יִחַמֵּל, comp. Isa. xxx. 14 sq. (break in pieces unsparingly). לֹא יִחַמֵּל certainly appears as though it must be referred to God (Ew., Hahn, Schlottm., and others), since חִלָּה sounds feminine; but one can either pronounce חִלָּה = חִיל as Milel (Hitz.), or take לֹא יִחַמֵּל adverbially, and not as an elliptical dependent clause (as Ges. § 147, rem. 1), but as virtually an adjective: in pain unsparing.

11 What is my strength, that I should wait,

And my end, that I should be patient?

12 Is my strength like the strength of stones?

Or is my flesh brazen?

¹ The primary meaning of סָלַד, according to the Arabic, is to be hard, then, to tread hard, firm, as in pulsanda tellus; whereas the poetry of the synagogue (Pijut) uses סָלַד in the signification to supplicate, and סָלַד, litany (not: hymn, as Zunz gives it); and the Mishna-talmudic סָלַד signifies to singe, burn one's self, and to draw back affrighted.

- 13 *Or am I then not utterly helpless,
And continuance is driven from me?*

The meaning of the question (ver. 11) is: Is not my strength already so wasted away, and an unfortunate end so certain to me, that a long calm waiting is as impossible as it is useless? הָאֲרִיָּה נֹפֵשׁ, to draw out the soul, is to extend and distribute the intensity of the emotion, to be forbearing, to be patient. The question (ver. 11) is followed by אִם, usual in double questions: or is my strength stone, etc. הָאִם, which is so differently explained by commentators, is after all to be explained best from Num. xvii. 28, the only other passage in which it occurs. Here it is the same as הָאִם, and this is the same as אִם הֲלֹא: or is it not so: we shall perish quickly altogether? Thus we explain the passage before us. The interrogative הָאִם is also sometimes used elsewhere for הֲלֹא, ch. xx. 4, xli. 1 (Ges. § 153, 3); the additional אִם stands per inversionem in the second instead of the first place: nonne an = an nonne, annon: or is it not so: my help is not in me = or am I not utterly helpless? Ewald explains differently (§ 356, a), according to which אִם, from the formula of an oath, is equivalent to לֹא. The meaning is the same. Continuance, תְּוֹשִׁיָּה, i.e. power of endurance, reasonable prospect is driven away, frightened away from him, is lost for him.

- 14 To him who is consumed gentleness is due from his friend, Otherwise he might forsake the fear of the Almighty.
15 *My brothers are become false as a torrent,
As the bed of torrents which vanish away—*
16 *They were blackish from ice,
Snow is hidden in them—*
17 *In the time, when warmth cometh to them, they are destroyed.
It becometh hot, they are extinguished from their place.*

Ewald supplies between 14a and 14b two lines which have professedly fallen out ("from a brother sympathy is due to the oppressed of God, in order he may not succumb to excessive grief"). Hitzig strongly characterizes this interpolation as a "pure swindle." There is really nothing wanting; but we need not even take הָסֵר, with Hitz., in the signification reproach (like Prov. xiv. 34): if reproach cometh to the sufferer from his friend, he forsaketh the fear of God. מִסֵּה (from מָסַה, liquefieri) is one who is inwardly melted, the disheartened. Such an one should receive הָסֵר from his friend, i.e. that he should restore him ἐν πνεύματι πραΰτητος (Gal. vi. 1). The waw (ver. 14b) is equivalent to alioqui with the future subjunctive (vid. Ges. § 127, 5). Harshness might precipitate him into the abyss from which love will keep him back. So Schnurrer: Afflicto exhibenda est ab amico ipsius humanitas, alioqui hic reverentiam Dei exuit. Such harshness instead of charity meets him from his brothers, i.e. friends beloved as brothers. In vain he has looked to them for reviving consolation. Theirs is no comfort; it is like the dried-up water of a wady. נַחַל is a mountain or forest brook, which comes down from the height, and in spring is swollen by melting ice and the snow that thaws on the mountain-tops, χειμάρρους, i.e. a torrent swollen by winter water. The melting blocks of ice darken the water of such a wady, and the snow falling together is quickly hidden in its bosom (הִתְעַלְמָה). If they begin to be warmed (Pual זָרַב, cognate to צָרַב, Ezek. xxi. 3, aduri, and שָׂרַף, comburare), suddenly they are reduced to nothing (נִצְטָה, extingui); they vanish away בְּחֹמוֹ, when it becomes hot. The suffix is, with Ew., Olsh., and others, to be taken as neuter; not with Hirz., to be referred to a suppressed עֵת: when the season grows hot. Job bewails the disappointment he has experienced, the "decline" of charity¹ still further, by keeping to the figure of the mountain torrent.

- 18 *The paths of their course are turned about,
They go up in the waste and perish.*
19 *The travelling bands of Têma looked for them,
The caravans of Saba hoped for them ;*
20 *They were disappointed on account of their trust,
They came thus far, and were red with shame.*

As the text is pointed, אֶרְחוֹת, ver. 18, are the paths of the torrents. Hirz., Ew., and Schlottm., however, correct אֶרְחוֹת, caravans, which Hahn even thinks may be understood without correction, since he translates: the caravans of their way are turned about (which is intended to mean: aside from the way that they are pursuing), march into the desert and perish (i.e. because the streams on which they reckoned are dried up). So, in reality, all modern commentators understand it, but is it likely that the poet would let the caravans perish in ver. 18, and in vers. 19 sq. still live? With this explanation, vers. 19 sq. drag along tautologically, and the feebler figure follows the stronger. Therefore we explain as follows: the mountain streams, נַחֲלִים, flow off in shallow serpentine brooks, and the shallow waters completely evaporate by the heat of the sun. עָלָה בַּתָּהוּ signifies to go up into nothing (comp. Isa. xl. 23), after the analogy of בָּלָה בְּעָשָׁן, to pass away in smoke. Thus e.g. also Mercier: in auras abeunt, in nihilum rediguntur. What next happens is related as a history, vers. 19 sq., hence the prætt. Job compares his friends to the wady swollen by ice and snow water, and even himself to the travelling bands languishing for water. He thirsts for friendly solace, but the seeming comfort which his friends utter is only as the scattered meandering waters in which the mountain brook leaks out. The sing. בָּטָח individualizes; it is unnecessary with Olsh. to read בָּטָחוּ.

when they are obliged to extend "the breasts of compassion" to their neighbour.

- 21 *For now ye are become nothing ;
You saw misfortune, and were affrighted.*
22 *Have I then said, Give unto me,
And give a present for me from your substance,*
23 *And deliver me from the enemy's hand,
And redeem me from the hand of the tyrant ?*

In ver. 21, the reading wavers between לו and לא, with the Keri לו; but לו, which is consequently the lectio recepta, gives no suitable meaning, only in a slight degree appropriate, as this: ye are become it, i.e. such a mountain brook; for הייתם is not to be translated, with Stickel and others, estis, but facti estis. The Targum, however, translates after the Chethib: ye are become as though ye had never been, i.e. nothingness. Now, since לא, Aramaic לָא, can (as Dan. iv. 32 shows) be used as a substantive (a not = a null), and the thought: ye are become nothing, your friendship proves itself equal to null, suits the imagery just used, we decide in favour of the Chethib; then in the figure עֲלָה בְּתֵהוֹ עֲלָה corresponds most to this, and is also, therefore, not to be explained away. The LXX., Syr., Vulg., translate לי instead of לו: ye are become it (such deceitful brooks) to me. Ewald proposes to read בן עתה הייתם לי (comp. the explanation, Ges. § 137, rem. 3),—a conjecture which puts aside all difficulty; but the sentence with לא commends itself as being bolder and more expressive. All the rest explains itself. It is remarkable that in ver. 21b the reading תִּירָאִי is also found, instead of תִּירָאִי: ye dreaded misfortune, and ye were then affrighted. קָבִי is here, as an exception, properispomenon, according to Ges. § 29, 3. כֹּחַ, as Prov. v. 10, Lev. xxvi. 20, what one has obtained by putting forth one's strength, syn. חֵיל, outward strength.

- 24 *Teach me, and I will be silent,
And cause me to understand wherein I have failed.*

- 25 *How forcible are words in accordance with truth !
But what doth reproof from you reprove ?*
- 26 *Do you think to reprove words ?
The words of one in despair belong to the wind.*
- 27 *Ye would even cast lots for the orphan,
And traffic about your friend.*

נִמְרָצוּ, ver. 25, in the signification of נִמְלָצוּ (Ps. cxix. 103), would suit very well : how smooth, delicate, sweet, are, etc. (Hirz., Ew., Schlottm.) ; but this meaning does not suit ch. xvi. 3. Hupfeld, by comparison with מָר, bitter, translates : quantumvis acerba ; but מָרָה may signify quidquid, though not quantumvis. Hahn compares the Arabic verb to be sick, and translates : in what respect are right words bad ; but physical disease and ethical badness are not such nearly related ideas. Ebrard : honest words are not taken amiss ; but with an inadmissible application of ch. xvi. 3. Von Gerl. is best : how strong or forcible are, etc. מָרַץ is taken as related to פָּרַץ, in the signification to penetrate ; Hiph. to goad ; Niph. to be furnished with the property of penetrating,—used here of penetrating speech ; 1 Kings ii. 8, of a curse inevitably carried out ; Mic. ii. 10, of unsparing destruction. Words which keep the straight way of truth, go to the heart ; on the contrary, what avails the reproving from you, i.e. which proceeds from you ? הוֹכִיחַ, inf. absol. as Prov. xxv. 27, and in but a few other passages as subject ; מִכָּבֶּם, as ch. v. 15, the sword going forth out of their mouth. In 26*b* the waw introduces a subordinate adverbial clause : while, however, the words of one in despair belong to the wind, that they may be carried away by it, not to the judgment which retains and analyzes them, without considering the mood of which they are the hasty expression. The futt. ver. 27 express the extent to which their want of feeling would go, if the circumstances for it only existed ; they are subjunctive, as ch. iii. 13, 16.

גִּזְרִי, the lot, is to be supplied to תַּפְּלוּ, as 1 Sam. xiv. 42. The verb בָּרָה, however, does not here signify to dig, so that שְׂחַת, a pit, should be supplied (Heiligst.), still less : dig out earth, and cast it on any one (Ebrard) ; but has the signification of buying and selling with עַל of the object, exactly like ch. xl. 30.

- 28 *And now be pleased to observe me keenly,
I will not indeed deceive you to your face.*
29 *Try it again, then : let there be no injustice ;
Try it again, my righteousness still stands.*
30 *Is there wrong on my tongue ?
Or shall not my palate discern iniquity ?*

He begs them to observe him more closely ; פָּנֶה בְּ, as Eccl. ii. 11, to observe scrutinizingly. אֵם is the sign of negative asseveration (Ges. § 155, 2, f). He will not indeed shamelessly give them the lie, viz. in respect to the greatness and inexplicableness of his suffering. The challenging שׁוּבוּ we do not translate : retrace your steps, but : begin afresh, to which both the following clauses are better suited. So Schlottm. and von Gerlach. Hahn retains the Chethib שׁוּבִי, in the signification : my answer ; but that is impossible : to answer is הֵשִׁיב, not שׁוּב. The עוֹר drawn to שׁוּבוּ by Rebia mugrasch is more suitably joined with צִדְקִיבָה, in which בָּהּ refers neutrally to the matter of which it treats. They are to try from the beginning to find that comfort which will meet the case. Their accusations are עוֹלָה ; his complaints, on the contrary, are fully justified. He does not grant that the outburst of his feeling of pain (ch. iii.) is עוֹלָה : he has not so completely lost his power against temptation, that he would not restrain himself, if he should fall into הַזֵּוֹת. Thus wickedness, which completely contaminates feeling and utterance, is called (Ps. lii. 4).

Job now endeavours anew to justify his complaints by turning more away from his friends and more towards God, but without penetrating the darkness in which God, the author of his suffering, is veiled from him.

- Ch. vii. 1 *Has not man a warfare upon earth,
And his days are like the days of a hireling?*
2 *Like a servant who longs for the shade,
And like a hireling who waits for his wages,*
3 *So am I made to possess months of disappointment,
And nights of weariness are appointed to me.*

The conclusion is intended to be : thus I wait for death as refreshing and rest after hard labour. He goes, however, beyond this next point of comparison, or rather he remains on this side of it. עָבַד is not service of a labourer in the field, but active military service, then fatigue, toil in general (Isa. xl. 20 ; Dan. x. 1). Ver. 2 Ewald and others translate incorrectly : as a slave longs, etc. כִּי can never introduce a comparative clause, except an infinitive, as e.g. Isa. v. 24, which can then under the regimen of this כִּי be continued by a verb. fin.; but it never stands directly for בְּאִשֶּׁר, as כִּמוֹ does in rare instances. In ver. 3, שָׁוָה retains its primary signification, nothingness, error, disappointment (ch. xv. 31) : months that one after another disappoint the hope of the sick. By this it seems we ought to imagine the friends as not having come at the very commencement of his disease. Elephantiasis is a disease which often lasts for years, and slowly but inevitably destroys the body. On כִּנּוּי, adnumeraverunt = adnumeratores sunt, vid. Ges. § 137, 3*.

- 4 *If I lie down, I think :
When shall I arise and the evening break away?
And I become weary with tossing to and fro until the morning dawn.*

- 5 *My flesh is clothed with worms and clods of earth ;
My skin heals up to fester again.*
6 *My days are swifter than a weaver's shuttle,
And vanish without hope.*

Most modern commentators take מִדֶּר as Piel from מָדַד. the night is extended (Renan : la nuit se prolonge), which is possible ; comp. Ges. § 52, 2. But the metre suggests another rendering : מִדֶּר constr. of מָדַד from מָדַד, to flee away : and when fleeing away of the evening. The night is described by its commencement, the late evening, to make the long interval of the sleeplessness and restlessness of the invalid prominent. In נִדְרִים and מִדֶּר there is a play of words (Ebrard). רִפְּוֶה, worms, in reference to the putrifying ulcers ; and נִדְּשׁ (with נִדְּשׁ, clod of earth, from the cracked, scaly, earth-coloured skin of one suffering with elephantiasis. The prætt. are used of that which is past and still always present, the futt. consec. of that which follows in and with the other. The skin heals, רָפָה (which we render with Ges., Ew., contrahere se) ; the result is that it becomes moist again. יִמָּאֵם, according to Ges. § 67, rem. 4 = יָמָם, Ps. lviii. 8. His days pass swiftly away ; the result is that they come to an end without any hope whatever. אָרָנִי is like κερκίς, radius, a weaver's shuttle, by means of which the weft is shot between the threads of the warp as they are drawn up and down. His days pass as swiftly by as the little shuttle passes backwards and forwards in the warp.

Next follows a prayer to God for the termination of his pain, since there is no second life after the present, and consequently also the possibility of requital ceases with death.

- 7 *Remember that my life is a breath,
That my eye will never again look on prosperity.*
8 *The eye that looketh upon me seeth me no more ;
If thine eyes look for me,—I am no more !*

- 9 *The clouds are vanished and passed away,
So he that goeth down to Sheól cometh not up.*
- 10 *He returneth no more to his house,
And his place knoweth him no more.*
- 11 *Therefore I will not curb my mouth ;
I will speak in the anguish of my spirit ;
I will complain in the bitterness of my soul.*

We see good, i.e. prosperity and joy, only in the present life. It ends with death. שׁוֹב with לֵּי infin. is a synonym of הוֹסִיף, ch. xx. 9. No eye (עַיִן femin.) which now sees me (prop. eye of my seer, as Gen. xvi. 13, comp. Job xx. 7, Ps. xxxi. 12, for רֹאֵי, Isa. xxix. 15, or רֹאֵי, Isa. xlvii. 10 ; according to another reading, רֹאִי : no eye of seeing, i.e. no eye with the power of seeing, from רָאָה, vision) sees me again ; even if thy eyes should be directed towards me to help me, my life is gone, so that I can no more be the subject of help. For from Sheól there is no return, no resurrection (comp. Ps. ciii. 16 for the expression) ; therefore will I at least give free course to my thoughts and feelings (comp. Ps. lxxvii. 4, Isa. xxxviii. 15, for the expression). The נֶם, ver. 11, is the so-called notionis ; the parallels cited by Michaelis are to the point, Ezek. xvi. 43, Mal. ii. 9, Ps. lii. 7. Here we first meet with the name of the lower world ; and in the book of Job we learn the ancient Israelitish conception of it more exactly than anywhere else. We have here only to do with the name in connection with the grammatical exposition. שְׁאוֹל (usually gen. fem.) is now almost universally derived from שָׁעַל = שָׁעַל, to be hollow, to be deepened ; and aptly so, for they imagined the Sheól as under ground, as Num. xvi. 30, 33 alone shows, on which account even here, as from Gen. xxxvii. 35 onwards, יָרַד שְׁאוֹלָה is everywhere used. It is, however, open to question whether this derivation is correct : at least passages like Isa. v. 14, Hab. ii. 5, Prov. xxx. 15 sq., show that in the later usage of the language, ^לשָׁאֵל, to demand, was thought of in connection with it; derived from which Sheôl signifies (1) the inevitable and inexorable demand made on everything earthly (an infinitive noun like ^לשָׁאֵל, ^{קִדָּר}); (2) conceived of as space, the place of shadowy duration whither everything on earth is demanded; (3) conceived of according to its nature, the divinely appointed fury which gathers in and engulfs everything on the earth. Job knows nothing of a demanding back, a redemption from Sheôl.

- 12 *Am I a sea or a sea-monster,
That thou settest a watch over me?*
- 13 *For I said, My bed shall comfort me;
My couch shall help me to bear my complaint.*
- 14 *Then thou scaredst me with dreams,
And thou didst wake me up in terror from visions,*
- 15 *So that my soul chose suffocation,
Death rather than this skeleton.*
- 16 *I loathe it, I would not live always;
Let me alone, for my days are breath.*

Since a watch on the sea can only be designed to effect the necessary precautions at its coming forth from the shores, it is probable that the poet had the Nile in mind when he used ^נ, and consequently the crocodile by ^{תנין}. The Nile is also called ^נ in Isa. xix. 5, and in Homer ὠκεανός, Egyptian oham (= ὠκεανός), and is even now called (at least by the Bedouins) bahhr (بحر) The illustrations of the book, says von Gerlach correctly, are chiefly Egyptian. On the contrary, Hahn thinks the illustration is unsuitable of the Nile, because it is not watched on account of its danger, but its utility; and Schlottman thinks it even small and contemptible without assigning a reason. The figure is, however, appropriate. As watches are set to keep the Nile in channels as soon as it breaks forth, and as men are set to watch that they may seize the crocodile immediately he moves here or there; so Job says all his movements are checked at the very commencement, and as soon as he desires to be more cheerful he feels the pang of some fresh pain. In ver. 13, כַּ after נִשְׁׁ is partitive, as Num. xi. 17; Mercier correctly: non-nihil querelam meam levabit. If he hopes for such repose, it forthwith comes to nought, since he starts up affrighted from his slumber. Hideous dreams often disturb the sleep of those suffering with elephantiasis, says Avicenna (in Stickel, S. 170). Then he desires death; he wishes that his difficulty of breathing would increase to suffocation, the usual end of elephantiasis. מִחַיֵּנֶק is absolute (without being obliged to point it מִחַיֵּנֶק with Schlottm.), as e.g. מִרְמָס, Isa. x. 6 (Ewald, § 160, c). He prefers death to these his bones, i.e. this miserable skeleton or framework of bone to which he is wasted away. He despises, i.e. his life, ch. ix. 21. Amid such suffering he would not live for ever. הָבֵל, like רוּחַ, ver. 7.

- 17 *What is man that Thou magnifiest him,
And that Thou turnest Thy heart toward him,*
18 *And visitest him every morning,
Triest him every moment?*
19 *How long dost Thou not look away from me,
Nor lettest me alone till I swallow down my spittle?*

The questions in ver. 17 sq. are in some degree a parody on Ps. viii. 5, comp. cxliv. 3, Lam. iii. 23. There it is said that God exalts puny man to a kingly and divine position among His creatures, and distinguishes him continually with new tokens of His favour; here, that instead of ignoring him, He makes too much of him, by selecting him, perishable as he is, as the object of ever new and ceaseless sufferings. כַּמָּה, quamdiu, ver. 19, is construed with the præt. instead of the fut.: how long will it continue that Thou turnest not away Thy look of anger from me ? as the synonymous עֲרֻמָּתִי, quousque, is sometimes construed with the præt. instead of the fut., e.g. Ps. lxxx. 5. “Until I swallow my spittle” is a proverbial expression for the minimum of time.

20 Have I sinned—what could I do to Thee ? !

O Observer of men,

Why dost Thou make me a mark to Thee,

And am I become a burden to Thee ?

21 And why dost Thou not forgive my transgression,

And put away my iniquity ?

For now I will lay myself in the dust,

And if Thou seekest for me, I am no more.

“I have sinned” is hypothetical (Ges. § 155, 4, a) : granted that I have sinned. According to Ewald and Olsh., מַה אֲפַעֵל־לָךְ defines it more particularly : I have sinned by what I have done to Thee, in my behaviour towards Thee ; but how tame and meaningless such an addition would be ! It is an inferential question : what could I do to Thee ? i.e. what harm, or also, since the fut. may be regulated by the præt. : what injury have I thereby done to Thee ? The thought that human sin, however, can detract nothing from the blessedness and glory of God, underlies this. With a measure of sinful bitterness, Job calls God נֹצֵר הָאָדָם, the strict and constant observer of men, per convicium fere, as Gesenius not untruly observes, nevertheless without a breach of decorum divinum (Renan : O Espion de l'homme), since the appellation, in itself worthy of God (Isa. xxvii. 3), is used here only somewhat unbecomingly. מִפְּנֵעַ is not the target for shooting at, which is rather מִטָּרָה (ch. xvi. 12, Lam. iii. 12), but the object on which one rushes with hostile violence (פָּנֵעַ בְּ). Why, says Job, hast Thou made me the mark of hostile attack, and why am I become a burden to Thee ? It is not so in our text ; but according to Jewish tradition, עָלַי, which we now have, is only a תקן סופרים, correctio scribarum,¹ for עלִיךְ, which was removed as bordering on blasphemy: why am I become a burden to Thee, so that Thou shouldest seek to get rid of me? This reading I should not consider as the original, in spite of the tradition, if it were not confirmed by the LXX., εἰμὶ δὲ ἐπὶ σοὶ φορτίον.

Here Job's second speech ends; it consists of two parts, which the division of chapters has correctly marked. The first part is addressed to the friends (nowhere specially to Eliphaz), because Job at once considers the address of Eliphaz as at the same time an expression of the thoughts and disposition of the two others who remain silent. In the second part he turns direct to God with his complaints, desponding inquiries, and longing for the alleviation of his sufferings before his approaching end. The correct estimate of this second speech of Job depends upon the right understanding of that of Eliphaz. It is not to be supposed that Job in this speech makes too much of his dignity and merit, as that he intends expressly to defend his innocence, or even enter into the controversy (Ew., Löwenth.); for Eliphaz does not at present go so far as to explain his suffering as the suffering commonly inflicted as punishment. When Job (ch. vi. 10) incidentally says that he does not disown the words of the Holy One, it does not deny that his sufferings may be chastisement: on the contrary, Job even allows the possibility that he may have sinned; but since his habitual state is fidelity to God, this assumption is not sufficient to account for his suffering, and he does not see why God should so unmercifully visit such sinfulness instead of pardoning it (ch. vii. 20, 21).

It is not to be objected, that he who is fully conscious of sin cannot consider the strictest divine punishment even of the smallest sin unjust. The suffering of one whose habitual state is pleasing to God, and who is conscious of the divine favour, can never be explained from, and measured according to, his infirmities: the infirmities of one who trusts in God, or the believer, and the severity of the divine justice in the punishment of sin, have no connection with one another. Consequently, when Eliphaz bids Job regard his affliction as chastisement, Job is certainly in the wrong to dispute with God concerning the magnitude of it: he would rather patiently yield, if his faith could apprehend the salutary design of God in his affliction; but after his affliction once seems to him to spring from wrath and enmity, and not from the divine purpose of mercy, after the phantom of a hostile God is come between him and the brightness of the divine countenance, he cannot avoid falling into complaint of unmercifulness. For this the speech of Eliphaz is in itself not to blame: he had most feelingly described to him God's merciful purpose in this chastisement, but he is to blame for not having taken the right tone.

The speech of Job is directed against the unsympathetic and reproving tone which the friends, after their long silence, have assumed immediately upon his first manifestation of anguish. He justifies to them his complaint (ch. iii.) as the natural and just outburst of his intense suffering, desires speedy death as the highest joy with which God could reward his piety, complains of his disappointment in his friends, from whom he had expected affectionate solace, but by whom he sees he is now forsaken, and earnestly exhorts them to acknowledge the justice of his complaint (ch. vi.). But can they? Yes, they might and should. For Job thinks he is no longer an object of divine favour: an inward conflict, which is still more terrible than hell, is added to his outward suffering. For the damned must give glory to God, because they recognise their suffering as just punishment: Job, however, in his suffering sees the wrath of God, and still is at the same time conscious of his innocence. The faith which, in the midst of his exhaustion of body and soul, still knows and feels God to be merciful, and can call him "my God," like Asaph in Ps. lxxiii.,—this faith is well-nigh overwhelmed in Job by the thought that God is his enemy, his pains the arrows of God. The assumption is false, but on this assumption Job's complaints (ch. iii.) are relatively just, including, what he himself says, that they are mistaken, thoughtless words of one in despair. But that despair is sin, and therefore also those curses and despairing inquiries!

Is not Eliphaz, therefore, in the right? His whole treatment is wrong. Instead of distinguishing between the complaint of his suffering and the complaint of God in Job's outburst of anguish, he puts them together, without recognising the complaint of his suffering to be the natural and unblameable result of its extraordinary magnitude, and as a sympathizing friend falling in with it. But with regard to the complaints of God, Eliphaz, acting as though careful for his spiritual welfare, ought not to have met them with his reproofs, especially as the words of one heavily afflicted deserve indulgence and delicate treatment; but he should have combated their false assumption. First, he should have said to Job, "Thy complaints of thy suffering are just, for thy suffering is incomparably great." In the next place, "Thy cursing thy birth, and thy complaint of God who has given thee thy life, might seem just if it were true that God has rejected thee; but that is not true: even in suffering He designs thy good; the greater the suffering, the greater the glory." By this means Eliphaz should have calmed Job's despondency, so as to destroy his false assumption; but he begins wrongly, and consequently what he says at last so truly and beautifully respecting the glorious issue of a patient endurance of chastisement, makes no impression on Job. He has not fanned the faintly burning wick, but his speech is a cold and violent breath which is calculated entirely to extinguish it.

After Job has defended the justice of his complaints against the insensibility of the friends, he gives way anew to lamentation. Starting from the wearisomeness of human life in general, he describes the greatness of his own suffering, which has received no such recognition on the part of the friends: it is a restless, torturing death without hope (ch. vii. 1-6). Then he turns to God: O remember that there is no second life after death, and that I am soon gone for ever; therefore I will utter my woe without restraint (vii. 7-11). Thus far (from ch. vi. 1 onwards) I find in Job's speech no trace of blasphemous or sinful despair. When he says (ch. vi. 8-12), How I would rejoice if God, whose word I have never disowned, would grant me my request, and end my life, for I can no longer bear my suffering,—I cannot with Ewald see in it despair rising to madness, which (ch. vii. 10) even increases to frantic joy. For Job's disease was indeed really in the eyes of men as hopeless as he describes it. In an incurable disease, however, imploring God to hasten death, and rejoicing at the thought of approaching dissolution, is not a sin, and is not to be called despair, inasmuch as one does not call giving up all hope of recovery despair.

Moreover, it must not be forgotten that the book of Job is an oriental book, and therefore some allowance must be made for the intensity and strength of conception of the oriental nature: then that it is a poetical book, and that frenzy and madness may not be also understood by the intensified expression in which poetry, which idealizes the real, clothes pain and joy: finally, that it is an Old Testament book, and that in the Old Testament the fundamental nature of man is indeed sanctified, but not yet subdued; the spirit shines forth as a light in a dark place, but the day, the ever constant consciousness of favour and life, has not yet dawned. The desire of a speedy termination of life (ch. vi. 8-12) is in ch. vii. 7-11 softened down even to a request for an alleviation of suffering, founded on this, that death terminates life for ever. In the Talmud (b. Bathra, 16, a) it is observed, on this passage, that Job denies the resurrection of the dead (מכאן שכפר איוב בתחיים המתים); but Job knows nothing of a resurrection of the dead, and what one knows not, one cannot deny. He knows only that after death, the end of the present life, there is no second life in this world, only a being in Sheôl, which is only an apparent existence = no existence, in which all praise of God is silent, because He no longer reveals himself there as to the living in this world (Ps. vi. 6, xxx. 10, lxxxviii. 11-13, cxv. 17). From this chaotic conception of the other side of the grave, against which even the psalmists still struggle, the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead had not been set forth at the time of Job, and of the author of the book of Job. The restoration of Israel buried in exile (Ezek. xxxvii.) first gave the impulse to it; and the resurrection of the Prince of Life, who was laid in the grave, set the seal upon it. The resurrection of Jesus Christ was first of all the actual overthrow of Hades.

Mortis seu inferni, observes Brentius, in accordance with Scripture, ea conditio est, ut natura sua quoscunque comprehenderit tantisper teneat nec dimittat, dum Christus, filius Dei, morte ad infernum descenderit, h.e. perierit; per hunc enim devicta morte et inferno liberantur quotquot fide renovati sunt. This great change in the destiny of the dead was incomplete, and the better hope which became brighter and brighter as the advent of death's Conqueror drew near was not yet in existence. For if after death, or what is the same thing, after the descent into Sheôl, there was only a non-existence for Job, it is evident that on the one hand he can imagine a life after death only as a return to the present world (such a return does, however, not take place), on the other hand that no divine revelation said anything to him of a future life which should infinitely compensate for a return to the present world. And since he knows nothing of a future existence, it can consequently not be said that he denies it: he knows nothing of it, and even his dogmatizing friends have nothing to tell him about it. We shall see by and by, how the more his friends torment him, the more he is urged on to the longing for a future life; but the word of revelation, which could alone change desire into hope, is wanting. The more tragic and heart-rending Job's desire to be freed by death from his unbearable suffering is, the more touching and importunate is his prayer that God may consider that now soon he can no longer be an object of His mercy. Just the same request is found frequently in the Psalms, e.g. Ps. lxxxix. 48, comp. ciii. 14-16: it involves nothing that is opposed to the Old Testament fear of God. Thus far we can trace nothing of frenzy and madness, and of despair only in so far as Job has given up the hope (נִאֲשָׁה) of his restoration,—not however of real despair, in which a man impatiently and forcibly snaps asunder the bond of trust which unites him to God. If the poet had anywhere made Job to go to such a length in despair, he would have made Satan to triumph over him.

Now, however, the last two strophes follow in which Job is hurried forward to the use of sinful language, ch. vii. 12-16: Am I a sea or a sea-monster, etc.; and ch. vii. 17-21: What is man, that thou accountest him so great, etc. We should nevertheless be mistaken if we thought there were sin here in the expressions by which Job describes God's hostility against himself. We may compare e.g. Lam. iii. 9, 10: "He hath enclosed my ways with hewn stone, He hath made my paths crooked; He is to me as a bear lying in wait, a lion in the thicket." It is, moreover, not Job's peculiar sin that he thinks God has changed to an enemy against him; that is the view which comes from his vision being beclouded by the conflict through which he is passing, as is frequently the case in the Psalms. His sin does not even consist in the inquiries, How long? and Wherefore? The Psalms in that case would abound in sin. But the sin is that he dwells upon these doubting questions, and thus attributes apparent mercilessness and injustice to God. And the friends constantly urge him on still deeper in this sin, the more persistently they attribute his suffering to his own unrighteousness. Jeremiah (in ch. iii. of the Lamentations), after similar complaints, adds: Then I repeated this to my heart, and took courage from it: the mercies of Jehovah, they have no end; His compassions do not cease, etc. Many of the Psalms that begin sorrowfully, end in the same way; faith at length breaks through the clouds of doubt. But it should be remembered that the change of spiritual condition which, e.g. in Ps. vi., is condensed to the narrow limits of a lyric composition of eleven verses, is here in Job worked out with dramatical detail as a passage of his life's history: his faith, once so heroic, only smoulders under ashes; the friends, instead of fanning it to a flame, bury it still deeper, until at last it is set free from its bondage by Jehovah himself, who appears in the whirlwind.

Bildad's First Speech.—Chap. viii.

Schema: 6. 7. 6. 10. 8. 6.¹

[Then began Bildad the Shuhite, and said:]

2 How long wilt thou utter such things,

And the words of thy mouth are a boisterous wind?

¹ We will give an example here of our and Ewald's computation of the strophes. "In the speech of Bildad, ch. viii.," says Ewald, Jahrb. ix. 35, "the first part may go to ver. 10, and be divided into three strophes of three lines each." This is right; but that the three strophes consist of three lines, i.e. according to Ewald's use of the word, three (Masoretic)

- 3 Will God reverse what is right,
Or the Almighty reverse what is just?
4 If thy children have sinned against Him,
He gave them over to the hand of their wickedness.

Bildad¹ begins harshly and self-confidently with quousque tandem, עֲרֹאנָה instead of the usual עֲרֹאנָה אֱלֹהִים, not: this, but: of this kind, of such kind, as ch. xii. 3, xvi. 2. רוּחַ כְּבִיר is poetical, equivalent to רוּחַ גְּדוֹלָה, ch. i. 19; רוּחַ is gen. comm. in the signification wind as well as spirit, although more frequently fem. than masc. He means that Job's speeches are like the wind in their nothingness, and like a boisterous wind in their vehemence. Bildad sees the justice of God, the Absolute One, which ought to be universally acknowledged, impugned in them. In order not to say directly that Job's verses, is accidental. There are three strophes, of which the first consists of six lines = stichs, the second of seven, the third again of six. "Just so then," Ewald proceeds, "the second part, vers. 11-19, is easily broken up into like three strophes," viz. vers. 11-13, 14-16, 17-19. But strophes must first of all be known as being groups of stichs forming a complete sense (Sinngruppen). They are, according to their idea, groups of measured compass, as members of a symmetrical whole. Can we, however, take vers. 14-16 together as such a complete group? In his edition of Job of 1854, Ewald places a semicolon after ver. 16; and rightly, for vers. 16-19 belong inseparably together. Taking them thus, we have in the second part of the speech three groups. In the first, vers. 11-15, the godless are likened to the reed; and his house in prosperity to a spider's web, since its perishableness, symbolized by the reed, is proved (אִשָּׁר, ver. 14). In the second, vers. 16-19, follows the figure of the climbing plant which ver. 19 (יִצְמָחוּ) seems to indicate. In the third, vers. 20-22, the figure is given up, and the strophe is entirely epi-mythionic. Of these three groups, the first consists of ten, the second of eight, and the third of six lines = stichs. The schema is therefore as we have given it above: 6. 7. 6. 10. 8. 6. We are only justified in calling these groups strophes by the predominance of the hexastich, which occurs at the beginning, middle, and close of the speech.

children had died such a sudden death on account of their sin, he speaks conditionally. If they have sinned, death is just the punishment of their sin. God has not arbitrarily swept them away, but has justly given them over to the destroying hand of their wickedness,—a reference to the prologue which belongs inseparably to the whole.

- 5 *If thou seekest unto God,
And makest supplication to the Almighty,*
6 *If thou art pure and upright ;
Surely ! He will care for thee,
And restore the habitation of thy righteousness ;*
7 *And if thy beginning was small, -
Thy end shall be exceeding great.*

There is still hope for Job (אַתָּה, in opposition to his children), if, turning humbly to God, he shows that, although not suffering undeservedly, he is nevertheless pure and upright in his inmost mind. Ver. 6a is so intended; not as Mercier and others explain: si in posterum puritati et justitiæ studueris. שָׁחַר אֱלֹהִים, to turn one's self to God earnestly seeking, constr. prægnans, like דָּרַשׁ אֱלֹהִים, ch. v. 8. Then begins the conclusion with בִּי־עֲתִידָהּ, like ch. xiii. 19. "The habitation of thy righteousness" is Job's household cleansed and justified from sin. God will restore that; שָׁלֵם might also signify, give peace to, but restore is far more appropriate. Completely falling back on שָׁלֵם, the Piel signifies to recompense, of like being returned for like, and to restore, of a complete covering of the loss sustained. God will not only restore, but increase beyond measure, what Job was and had. The verb. masc. after אַחֲרֶיךָ here is remarkable. But we need not, with Olsh., read וַיִּשְׁנֶה: we may suppose, with Ewald, according to § 174, e, that אַחֲרֶיךָ is purposely treated as masc. It would be a mistake to refer to Prov. xxiii. 32, xxix. 21, in support of it.

- 8 *For inquire only of former ages,
And attend to the research of their fathers—*
9 For we are of yesterday, without experience, Because our days upon earth are a shadow—
10 *Shall they not teach thee, speak to thee,
And bring forth words from their heart?*

This challenge calls Deut. xxxii. 7 to mind. לִבְךָ is to be supplied to בִּינֶנּוּ; the conjecture of Olshausen, וּבִינֶנּוּ, is good, but unnecessary. רִישֹׁן is after the Aramaic form of writing, comp. ch. xv. 7, where this and the ordinary form are combined. The "research of their fathers," i.e. which the fathers of former generations have bequeathed to them, is the collective result of their research, the profound wisdom of the ancients gathered from experience. Our ephemeral and shadowy life is not sufficient for passing judgment on the dealings of God; we must call history and tradition to our aid. We are תְּמוֹל (per aphæresin, the same as אֶתְמוֹל), yesterday = of yesterday; it is not necessary to read, with Olshausen, מִתְמוֹל. There is no occasion for us to suppose that ver. 9 is an antithesis to the long duration of the life of primeval man. לֵב (ver. 10) is not the antithesis of mouth; but has the pregnant signification of a feeling, i.e. intelligent heart, as we find אִישׁ לֵבָב, a man of heart, i.e. understanding, ch. xxxiv. 10, 34. יִצְיִיא, promunt, calls to mind Matt. xiii. 52. Now follow familiar sayings of the ancients, not directly quoted, but the wisdom of the fathers, which Bildad endeavours to reproduce.

- 11 *Doth papyrus grow up without mire?
Doth the reed shoot up without water?*
12 *If it is still in luxuriant verdure, when it is not cut off,
Then before all other grass it withereth.*
13 So is the way of all forgetters of God,

- And the hope of the ungodly perisheth,*
 14 Because his hope is cut off,
And his trust is a spider's house :
 15 He leaneth upon his house and it standeth not,
He holdeth fast to it and it endureth not.

Bildad likens the deceitful ground on which the prosperity of the godless stands to the dry ground on which, only for a time, the papyrus or reed finds water, and grows up rapidly : shooting up quickly, it withers as quickly ; as the papyrus plant,¹ if it has no perpetual water, though the finest of grasses, withers off when most luxuriantly green, before it attains maturity. סִפְיָה, which, excepting here, is found only in connection with Egypt (Ex. ii. 3, Isa. xviii. 2; and Isa. xxxv. 7, with the general קַנָּה as specific name for reed), is the proper papyrus plant (Cypērus pap̄yrus, L.) : this name for it is suitably derived in the Hebrew from סִפַּף, to suck up (comp. Lucan, iv. 136 : conseritur bibulā Memphytis cymba papyro) ; but is at the same time Egyptian, since Coptic kam, cham, signifies the reed, and 'góm, 'gōme, a book (like liber, from the bark of a tree).² סִפְיָה, occurring only in the book of Job and in the history of Joseph, as Jerome (Opp. ed. Vallarsi, iv. 291) learned from the Egyptians, signifies in their language, omne quod in palude virens nascitur : the word is transferred by the LXX. into their translation in the form ἄχι (ἄχει), and became really incorporated into the Alexandrian Greek, as is evident from Isa. xix. 7 (חֲרָץ, LXX. καὶ τὸ ἄχι τὸ χλωρόν) and Sir. xl. 16 (ἄχει ἐπὶ παντὸς ὕδατος καὶ χεῖλους ποταμοῦ πρὸ παντὸς χόρτου ἐκτιλήσεται); the Coptic translates pī-akhi, and moreover ake, oke signify in Coptic calamus, juncus.¹ אֲחִי יִקְטָר describes its condition: in a condition in which it is not ready for being gathered. By חֲרָץ, quippe, quoniam, this end of the man who forgets God, and of the חֲרָץ, i.e. the secretly wicked, is more particularly described. His hope יִקְטָר, from יִקְטָר, or from יִקְטָר, med. o,² in neuter signification succiditur. One would indeed expect a figure corresponding to the spider's web rather; and accordingly Hahn, after Reiske, translates: whose hope is a gourd,—an absurd figure, and linguistically impossible, since the gourd or cucumber is אֲשָׁר, which has its cognates in Arabic and Syriac. Saadia³ translates: whose hope is the thread of the sun. The “thread of the sun” is what we call the fliegender Sommer or Altweibersommer [Engl. gossamer, fine cob-web which flies about in the air]: certainly a suitable figure, but unsupportable by any parallel in language.⁴ We must therefore

¹ The tradition of Jerome, that חֲרָץ originally signifies viride, is supported by the corresponding use of the verb in the signification to be green. So in the Papyr. Anastas. No. 3 (in Brugsch, Aeg. Geographie, S. 20, No. 115): naif hesbu achach em sim, his fields are green with herbs; and in a passage in Young, Hieroglyphics, ii. 69: achechut uoi ās em senem't, the beautiful field is green with senem. The second radical is doubled in achech, as in uot-uet, which certainly signifies viriditas. The substantive is also found represented by three leaf-stalks on one basis; its radical form is ah, plural, weaker or stronger aspirated, ahu or akhu, greenness: comp. Salvolini, Campagne de Rhamsès le Grand, p. 117; and Brugsch, above, S. 25.

⁴ Saadia's interpretation cannot be supported from the Arabic, for the Arabs call the “Altweibersommer” the deceitful thread (el-chaitt el- suppose that יָקוּט, succiditur, first gave rise to the figure which follows: as easily as a spider's web is cut through, without offering any resistance, by the lightest touch, or a breath of wind, so that on which he depends and trusts is cut asunder. The name for spider's web, בֵּית עֲכָבִישׁ,¹ leads to the description of the prosperity of the ungodly by בֵּית (ver. 15): His house, the spider's house, is not firm to him. Another figure follows: the wicked in his prosperity is like a climbing plant, which grows luxuriantly for a time, but suddenly perishes.

- 16 *He swells with sap in the sunshine,
And his branch spreads itself over his garden.*
17 *His roots intertwine over heaps of stone,
He looks upon a house of stones.*
18 *If He casts him away from his place,
It shall deny him: I have not seen thee.*
19 *Behold, thus endeth his blissful course,
And others spring forth from the dust.*

The subject throughout is not the creeping-plant directly, but the ungodly, who is likened to it. Accordingly the exbâtîl), or "sunslime or spittle" (lu'âb es-schems), or خَيْتُور (a word which Ewald, Jahrb. ix. 38, derives from خَيْت = יָקוּט, a word which does not exist, and عَوْر, chaff, a word which is not Arabic), from خَتَرَ, to roam about, to be dispersed, to perish, vanish. From this radical signification, chaita'ûr, like many similar old Arabic words with a fulness of figurative and related meaning, is become an expression for a number of different things, which may be referred to the notion of roaming about and dispersion. Among others, as the Turkish Kamus says, "That thing which on extremely hot days, in the form of a spider's web, looks as though single threads came down from the atmosphere, which is caused by the thickness of the air," etc. The form brought forward by Ew., written with ت or ث, is, moreover, a fabrication of our lexicons (Fl.).

pression of the thought is in part figurative and in part literal, בֵּית אֲבָנִים יִהְיֶה (ver. 17*b*). As the creeper has stones before it, and by its interwindings, as it were, so rules them that it may call them its own (v. Gerlach: the exuberant growth twines itself about the walls, and looks proudly down upon the stony structure); so the ungodly regards his fortune as a solid structure, which he has quickly caused to spring up, and which seems to him imperishable. Ewald translates: he separates one stone from another; בֵּית, according to § 217, g, he considers equivalent to בֵּינָה, and signifies apart from one another; but although הָזָה = הָזָה, according to its radical idea, may signify to split, pierce through, still בֵּית, when used as a preposition, can signify nothing else but, within. Others, e.g. Rosenmüller, translate: he marks a place of stones, i.e. meets with a layer of stones, against which he strikes himself; for this also בֵּית will not do. He who casts away (ver. 18) is not the house of stone, but God. He who has been hitherto prosperous, becomes now as strange to the place in which he flourished so luxuriantly, as if it had never seen him. Behold, that is the delight of his way (course of life), i.e. so fashioned, so perishable is it, so it ends. From the ground above which he sprouts forth, others grow up whose fate, when they have no better ground of confidence than he, is the same. After he has placed before Job both the blessed gain of him who trusts, and the sudden destruction of him who forgets, God, as the result of the whole, Bildad recapitulates:

20 *Behold! God despiseth not the perfect man,
And taketh not evil-doers by the hand.*

21 *While He shall fill thy mouth with laughing,
And thy lips with rejoicing,*

22 *They who hate thee shall be clothed with shame,
And the tent of the ungodly is no more.*

“To take by the hand,” i.e. ready to help as His own, as Isa.

xli. 13, xlii. 6. Instead of עַר (ver. 21), there is no great difficulty in reading עֵר: again (as e.g. Ps. xlii. 6) He will fill; but even עַר is supportable; it signifies, like ch. i. 18, Ps. cxli. 10, while. On the form יַמְלִיךָ, vid. Ges. § 75, 21, b. This close of Bildad's speech sounds quite like the Psalms (comp. Ps. cxxvi. 2 with ver. 21; Ps. xxxv. 26, cix. 29, cxxxii. 18, with ver. 22). Bildad does all he can to win Job over. He calls the ungodly שֵׁנְאִי, to show that he tries to think and expect the best of Job.

We have seen that Job in his second speech charges God with the appearance of injustice and want of compassion. The friends act as friends, by not allowing this to pass without admonition. After Job has exhausted himself with his complaints, Bildad enters into the discussion in the above speech. He defends the justice of God against Job's unbecoming words. His assertion that God does not swerve from the right, is so true that it would be blasphemy to maintain against him that God sometimes perverts the right. And Bildad seems also to make the right use of this truth when he promises a glorious issue to his suffering, as a substantial proof that God does not deal unjustly towards him; for Job's suffering does actually come to such an issue, and this issue in its accomplishment destroys the false appearance that God had been unjust or unmerciful towards him. Bildad expresses his main point still more prudently, and more in accordance with the case before him, when he says, "Behold! God does not act hostilely towards the godly, neither does He make common cause with the evil-doer" (ver. 20),—a confession which we must allow is on both sides the most absolute truth. By the most telling figures he portrays the perishableness of the prosperity of those who forget God, and paints in glowing colours on this dark background the future which awaits Job. What is there in this speech of Bildad to censure, and how is it that it does not produce the desired cheering effect on Job?

It is true that nothing that God sends to man proceeds from injustice, but it is not true that everything that He sends to him comes from His justice. As God does not ordain suffering for the hardened sinner in order to improve him, because He is merciful, so He does not ordain suffering for the truly godly in order to punish him, because He is just. What we call God's attributes are only separate phases of His indivisible holy being,—ad extra, separate modes of His operation in which they all share,—of which, when in operation, one does not act in opposition to another; they are not, however, all engaged upon the same object at one time. One cannot say that God's love manifests itself in action in hell, nor His anger in heaven; nor His justice in the afflictions of the godly, and His mercy in the sufferings of the godless.

Herein is Bildad's mistake, that he thinks his commonplace utterance is sufficient to explain all the mysteries of human life. We see from his judgment of Job's children how unjust he becomes, since he regards the matter as the working out of divine justice. He certainly speaks hypothetically, but in such a way that he might as well have said directly, that their sudden death was the punishment of their sin. If he had found Job dead, he would have considered him as a sinner, whom God had carried off in His anger. Even now he has no pleasure in promising Job help and blessing; accordingly from his point of view he expresses himself very conditionally: If thou art pure and upright. We see from this that his belief in Job's uprightness is shaken, for how could the All-just One visit Job with such severe suffering, if he had not deserved it! Nevertheless אִם זָךְ וְיָשָׁר אַתָּה (ver. 6) shows that Bildad thinks it possible that Job's heart may be pure and upright, and consequently his present affliction may not be peremptory punishment, but only disciplinary chastisement. Job must—such is Bildad's counsel—give God glory, and acknowledge that he deserves nothing better; and thus humbling himself beneath the just hand of God, he will be again made righteous, and exalted.

Job cannot, however, comprehend his suffering as an act of divine justice. His own fidelity is a fact, his consciousness of which cannot be shaken : it is therefore impossible for him to deny it, for the sake of affirming the justice of God ; for truth is not to be supported by falsehood. Hence Bildad's glorious promises afford Job no comfort. Apart from their being awkwardly introduced, they depend upon an assumption, the truth of which Job cannot admit without being untrue to himself. Consequently Bildad, though with the best intention, only urges Job still further forward and deeper into the conflict.

But does, then, the confession of sin on the part of constantly sinful man admit of his regarding the suffering thus appointed to him not merely not as punishment, but also not as chastisement ? If a sufferer acknowledges the excessive hideousness of sin, how can he, when a friend bids him regard his affliction as a wholesome chastisement designed to mortify sin more and more,—how can he suffer himself to fall into such impatience as we see in the case of Job ? The utterances of Job are, in fact, so wild, inconsiderate, and unworthy of God, and the first speeches of Eliphaz and Bildad on the contrary so winning and appropriate, that if Job's affliction ought really to be regarded from the standpoint of chastisement, their tone could not be more to the purpose, nor exhortation and comfort more beautifully blended. Even when one knows the point of the book, one will still be constantly liable to be misled by the speeches of the friends ; it requires the closest attention to detect what is false in them. The poet's mastery of his subject, and the skill with which he exercises it, manifests itself in his allowing the opposition of the friends to Job, though existing in the germ from the very beginning, to become first of all in the course of the controversy so harsh that they look upon Job as a sinner undergoing punishment from God, while in opposition to them he affirms his innocence, and challenges a decision from God.

The poet, however, allows Bildad to make one declaration, from which we clearly see that his address, beautiful as it is, rests on a false basis, and loses its effect. Bildad explains the sudden death of Job's children as a divine judgment. He could not have sent a more wounding dart into Job's already broken heart; for is it possible to tell a man anything more heart-rending than that his father, his mother, or his children have died as the direct punishment of their sins? One would not say so, even if it should seem to be an obvious fact, and least of all to a father already sorely tried and brought almost to the grave with sorrow. Bildad, however, does not rely upon facts, he reasons only à priori. He does not know that Job's children were godless; the only ground of his judgment is the syllogism: Whoever dies a fearful, sudden death must be a great sinner; God has brought Job's children to such a death; ergo, etc. Bildad is zealously affected for God, but without understanding. He is blind to the truth of experience, in order not to be drawn away from the truth of his premiss. He does not like to acknowledge anything that furnishes a contradiction to it. It is this same rationalism of superstition or credulity which has originated the false doctrine of the decretum absolutum. With the same icy and unfeeling rigorism with which Calvinism refers the divine rule, and all that happens upon earth, to the one principle of absolute divine will and pleasure, in spite of all the contradictions of Scripture and experience, Bildad refers everything to the principle of the divine justice, and, indeed, divine justice in a judicial sense.

There is also another idea of justice beside this judicial one. Justice, צדקה or צדק, is in general God's dealings as ruled by His holiness. Now there is not only a holy will of God concerning man, which says, Be ye holy, for I am holy;

but also a purpose for the redemption of unholy man springing from the holy love of God to man. Accordingly justice is either the agreement of God's dealings with the will of His holiness manifest in the demands of the law, apart from redemption, or the agreement of His dealings with the will of His love as graciously manifested in the gospel; in short, either retributive or redemptive. If one, as Bildad, in the first sense says, God never acts unjustly, and glaringly maintains it as universally applicable, the mystery of the divine dispensations is not made clear thereby, but destroyed. Thus also Job's suffering is no longer a mystery: Job suffers what he deserves; and if it cannot be demonstrated, it is to be assumed in contradiction to all experience. This view of his affliction does not suffice to pacify Job, in spite of the glorious promises by which it is set off. His conscience bears him witness that he has not merited such incomparably heavy affliction; and if we indeed suppose, what we must suppose, that Job was in favour with God when this suffering came upon him, then the thought that God deals with him according to his works, perhaps according to his unacknowledged sins, must be altogether rejected.

God does not punish His own; and when He chastises them, it is not an act of His retributive justice, but of His disciplinary love. This motive of love, indeed, belongs to chastisement in common with trial; and the believer who clearly discerns this love will be able to look upon even the severest affliction as chastisement without being led astray, because he knows that sin has still great power in him; and the medicine, if it is designed to heal him, must be bitter. If, therefore, Bildad had represented Job's affliction as the chastisement of divine love, which would humble him in order the more to exalt him, then Job would have humbled himself, although Bildad might not be altogether in the right. But Bildad, still further than Eliphaz from weakening the erroneous supposition of a hostile God which had taken possession of Job's mind, represents God's justice, to which he attributes the death of his children, instead of His love, as the hand under which Job is to humble himself. Thereby the comfort which Job's friend offers becomes to him a torture, and his trial is made still greater; for his conscience does not accuse him of any sins for which he should now have an angry instead of a gracious God.

But we cannot even here withhold the confession that the composition of such a drama would not be possible under the New Testament. The sight of the suffering of Christ and the future crown has a power in calming the mind, which makes such an outburst of sorrow as that of Job impossible even under the strongest temptation. "If the flesh should murmur and cry out, as Christ even cried out and was feeble," says Luther in one of his consolatory letters (Rambach, Kleine Schriften Luthers, S. 627), "the spirit nevertheless is ready and willing, and with sighings that cannot be uttered will cry: Abba, Father, that is: Thy rod is hard, but Thou art still Father; I know that of a truth." And since the consciousness of sin is as deep as the consciousness of grace, the Christian will not consider any suffering so severe but that he may have deserved severer on account of his sins, even though in the midst of his cross he be unable clearly to recognise the divine love. Even such uncharitable, cold-hearted consolation as that of Eliphaz and Bildad, which bids him regard the divine trial as divine chastisement, cannot exasperate him, since he is conscious of the need for even severer divine chastisement; he need not therefore allow the uncharitableness of the friends to pass without loving counter-exhortations.

Hengstenberg observes, in the Excursus to his Commentary on the Psalms, that the righteousness on which the plea to be heard is based in the Psalms, like Ps. xvii., xviii. 21 sqq.,

xliv. 18-23, is indeed a righteousness of conduct resting on righteousness by faith, and also this again is only to be considered as the righteousness of endeavour; that moreover their strong tone does not sound altogether becoming, according to our consciousness. We should expect each time, as it happens sometimes urgently (e.g. Ps. cxliii. 2), the other side,—that human infirmity which still clings to the righteous should be made prominent, and divine forgiveness for it implored, instead of the plea for deliverance being based on the incongruity of the affliction with the sufferer's righteousness of life known to God. We cannot altogether adopt such psalms and passages of the Psalms as expressive of our Christian feeling; and we are scarcely able to read them in public without hesitation when we attempt it. Whence is this? Hengstenberg replies, "The Old Testament wanted the most effectual means for producing the knowledge of sin—the contemplation of the sufferings of Christ. The New Testament, moreover, possesses a more powerful agency of the Spirit, which does not search more into the depths of the divine nature than it lays open the depths of sin. Hence in Christian songs the sense of sin, as it is more independent of outward occasions than formerly, so it is also more openly disclosed and more delicate in itself; its ground is felt to lie deeper, and also the particular manifestations. It was good that under the Old Covenant the cords of sinful conviction were not strung too tightly, as the full consolation was still not to be found. The gulph closed up again when the sufferings were gone."¹ Such is the actual connection. And this development of the work of redemption in the history of mankind is repeated in the individual experience of every believer. As the individual, the further he progresses in the divine life, becomes the more deeply conscious of the natural depravity of man, and acquires a keener and still keener perception of its most subtle working ; so in the New Testament, with the disclosure of actual salvation, a deeper insight into sin is also given. When the infinite depth and extent of the kingdom of light is unveiled, the veil is for the first time removed from the abyss of the kingdom of darkness. Had the latter been revealed without the former in the dispensation before Christ, the Old Testament would have been not only what it actually was in connection with the then painful consciousness of sin and death,—a school of severe discipline preparatory to the New Testament, a school of ardent longing for redemption,—but would have become an abyss of despair.

Job's Second Answer.—Chap. ix. x.

Schema: 6. 6. 6. 10. 10. 9. 8. 9. | 9 (ch. ix. 34-x. 2). 11. 10. 12. 11.

[Then Job began, and said :]

2 Yea, indeed, I know it is thus,

And how should a man be just with God !

3 Should he wish to contend with God,

He could not answer Him one of a thousand.

4 The wise in heart and mighty in strength,

Who hath defied Him and remained unhurt ?

Job does not (ver. 2) refer to what Eliphaz said (ch. iv. 17), which is similar, though still not exactly the same ; but “indeed I know it is so” must be supposed to be an assent to that which Bildad had said immediately before. The chief thought of Bildad’s speech was, that God does not pervert what is right. Certainly (עֲדָנָה, scilicet, nimirum, like ch. xii. 2),—says Job, as he ironically confirms this maxim of Bildad’s,—it is so : what God does is always right, because God does it ; how could man maintain that he is in the right in opposition to God ! If God should be willing to enter into controversy with man, he would not be able to give Him information on one of a thousand subjects that might be brought into discussion; he would be so confounded, so disarmed, by reason of the infinite distance of the feeble creature from his Creator. The attributes (ver. 4a) belong not to man (Olshausen), but to God, as ch. xxxvi. 5, Is. xxxi. 2. God is wise of heart (לֵב = voûs) in putting one question after another, and mighty in strength in bringing to nought every attempt man may make to maintain his own right; to defy Him (הִקְשָׁה, to harden, i.e. הֶעָרָה, the neck), therefore, always tends to the discomfiture of him who dares to bid Him defiance.

5 *Who removeth mountains without their knowing,
That He hath overturned them in His wrath;*

6 *Who causeth the earth to shake out of its place,
And its pillars to tremble;*

7 *Who commandeth the sun, and it riseth not,
And sealet up the stars.*

וְלֹא יָדְעוּ (ver. 5a) may also be translated: without one's perceiving it or knowing why; but it is more natural to take the mountains as the subject. אֲשֶׁר, quod, that (not "as," Ewald, § 333, a), after יָדַע, as Ezek. xx. 26, Eccl. viii. 12. Even the lofty mountains are quite unconscious of the change which He effects on them in a moment. Before they are aware that it is being done, it is over, as the præt. implies; the destructive power of His anger is irresistible, and effects its purpose suddenly. He causes the earth to start up from its place (comp. Isa. xiii. 13) which it occupies in space (ch. xxvi. 7); and by being thus set in motion by Him, its pillars tremble, i.e. its internal foundations (Ps. civ. 5), which are removed from human perception (ch. xxxviii. 6). It is not the highest mountains, which are rather called the pillars, as it were the supports, of heaven (ch. xxvi. 11), that are meant. By the same almighty will He disposes of the sun and stars. The sun is here called הָרֶם (as in Judg. xiv. 18 הָרֶם with unaccented ah, and as Isa. xix. 18 ‘Ir ha-Heres is a play upon עִיר הַחֶרֶס, ‘Hliούπολις), perhaps from the same root as חֶרֶץ, one of the poetical names of gold. At His command the sun rises not, and He seals up the stars, i.e. conceals them behind thick clouds, so that the day becomes dark, and the night is not made bright. One may with Schultens think of the Flood, or with Warburton of the Egyptian darkness, and the standing still of the sun at the word of Joshua; but these are only single historical instances of a fact here affirmed as a universal experience of the divine power.

8 *Who alone spreadeth out the heavens,
And walketh upon the heights of the sea;*

9 *Who made the Bear, Orion, and the Pleiades,
And the chambers of the south;*

10 *Who doeth great things past finding out,
And wondrous things without number.*

Ewald, Hirzel, and others, understand נָטָה (ver. 8) according to Ps. xviii. 10: He letteth down the clouds of heaven, and walketh on the heights of the sea of clouds, i.e. high above the towering thunder-clouds. But parallel passages, such as Isa. xl. 22, Ps. civ. 2, and especially Isa. xlv. 24, show that ver. 8a is to be understood as referring to the creation of the firmament of heaven; and consequently נָטָה is to be taken in the sense of expandere, and is a form of expression naturally occurring in connection with the mention of the waters which are separated by means of the רָקִיעַ. The question arises, whether נָטָה here means the sea of waters above the firmament or upon the earth. According to the idea of the ancients, the waters which descend as rain have their habitation far away in the infinite expanse of the sky; the ocean of the sky (Egyptian Nun-pa), through which the sun-god Ra sails every day, is there. It is possible that "the heights of the sea" here, and perhaps also "the roots of the sea" (ch. xxxvi. 30), may mean this ocean of the sky, as Hahn and Schlottmann suppose. But it is not necessary to adopt such an explanation, and it is moreover hazardous, since this conception of the celestial θάλασσα is not found elsewhere (apart from Apoc. iv. 6, xv. 2, xxii. 1). Why may not בְּמַתֵּי, which is used of the heights of the clouds (Isa. xiv. 14), be used also of the waves of the sea which mount up towards heaven (Ps. cvii. 26)? God walks over them as man walks on level ground (LXX. περιπατῶν ἐπὶ θαλάσσης ὡς ἐπ' ἐδάφους); they rise or lie calmly beneath His feet according to His almighty will (comp. Hab. iii. 15).

Job next describes God as the Creator of the stars, by introducing a constellation of the northern (the Bear), one of the southern (Orion), and one of the eastern sky (the Pleiades). שֵׁץ, contracted from שֵׁץִּי, Arabic نَعرش, a bier, is the constellation of seven stars (septentrio or septentriones) in the northern sky. The Greater and the Lesser Bear form a square, which the Arabs regarded as a bier; the three other stars, benâth na'sch, i.e. daughters of the bier (comp. ch. xxxviii. 32), seem to be the mourners. בְּכִיל is Orion chained to the sky, which the ancients regarded as a powerful giant, and also as an insolent, foolish fellow¹ (K. O. Müller, Kleine deutsche Schriften, ii. 125). בְּיָמָה is the Pleiades, a constellation consisting of seven large and other smaller stars, Arabic ثُرَيَّا, which, like the Hebrew (comp.

and is compared by the Persian poets to a bouquet formed of jewels. It is the constellation of seven stars, whose rising and setting determined the commencement and end of their voyages (πλειάς, probably = constellation of navigation), and is to be distinguished from the northern septentriones. חֲדָרֵי הַיָּמִן are, according to the Targ., the chambers of the constellations on the south side of the heavens, as also most expositors explain them (Mercier: sidera quæ sunt in altero hemisphærio versus alterum polum antarcticum), according to which הַיָּמִן, or written defectively יָמִן, would therefore be equivalent to כּוֹכְבֵי הַיָּמִן; or perhaps, in a more general meaning, the regions of the southern sky (penetralia), which are veiled, or altogether lost to view (Hirzel). In ver 10, Job says, almost verbatim, what Eliphaz had said (ch. v. 9). Job agrees with the friends in the recognition of the power of God, and intentionally describes those phases of it which display its terrible majesty. But while the friends deduce from this doctrine the duty of a humble deportment on the part of the sufferer, Job uses it to support the cheerless truth that human right can never be maintained in opposition to the absolute God.

- 11 Behold, He goeth by me and I see not,
And passeth by and I perceive Him not.
- 12 Behold, He taketh away, who will hold Him back?
Who will say to Him: What doest Thou?
- 13 Eloah restraineth not His anger,
The helpers of Rahab stoop under Him—
- 14 How much less should I address Him,
Should I choose the right words in answer to Him;
- 15 Because, though I were right, I could not answer,—
To Him as my Judge I must make supplication.

God works among men, as He works in nature, with a supreme control over all, invisibly, irresistibly, and is not responsible to any being (Isa. xlv. 9). He does not turn or restrain His anger without having accomplished His purpose.

This is a proposition which, thus broadly expressed, is only partially true, as is evident from Ps. lxxviii. 38. The helpers of Rahab must bow themselves under Him. It is not feasible to understand this in a general sense, as meaning those who are ready with boastful arrogance to yield succour to any against God. The form of expression which follows in ver. 14, "much less I," supports the assumption that עֲזָרֵי רַהַב refers to some well-known extraordinary example of wicked enterprise which had been frustrated, notwithstanding the gigantic strength by which it was supported; yet נִשְׁחָחֵי may be translated by the present tense, since a familiar fact is used as synonymous with the expression of an universal truth. Elsewhere Rahab as a proper name denotes Egypt (Ps. lxxxvii. 4), but it cannot be so understood here, because direct references to events in the history of Israel are contrary to the character of the book, which, with remarkable consistency, avoids everything that is at all Israelitish. But how has Egypt obtained the name of Rahab? It is evident from Isa. xxx. 7 that it bears this name with reference to its deeds of prowess; but from Ps. lxxxix. 11, Isa. li. 9, it is evident that Rahab properly denotes a sea-monster, which has become the symbol of Egypt, like tannîn and leviathan elsewhere. This signification of the word is also supported by ch. xxvi. 12, where the LXX. actually translate κῆτος, as here with remarkable freedom, ὑπ' αὐτοῦ ἐκάμφθησαν κήτη τὰ ὑπ' οὐρανόν. It is not clear whether these "sea-monsters" denote rebels cast down into the sea beneath the sky, or chained upon the sky; but at any rate the consciousness of a distinct mythological meaning in עֲזָרֵי רַהַב is expressed by this translation (as also in the still freer translation of Jerome, et sub quo curvantur qui portant orbem); probably a myth connected with such names of the constellations as Κῆτος and Πρίστis (Ewald, Hirz., Schlottm.). The poesy of the book of Job even in other places does not spurn mythological allusions; and the phrase before us reminds one of the Hindu myth of Indras' victory over the dark demon Vritras, who tries to delay the descent of rain, and over his helpers. In Vritras, as in רִיב, there is the idea of hostile resistance.

Job compares himself, the feeble one, to these mythical titanic powers in ver. 14. אֲנִי כִּי (properly: even that), or even אֲנִי alone (ch. iv. 19), signifies, according as the connection introduces a climax or anti-climax, either quanto magis or quanto minus, as here: how much less can I, the feeble one, dispute with Him! אֲנִי, ver. 15, is best taken, as in ch. v. 5, in the signification quoniam. The part. Poel מְשַׁפֵּט we should more correctly translate "my disputant" than "my judge;" it is Poel which Ewald appropriately styles the conjugation of attack: שֹׁפֵט, judicando vel litigando aliquem petere; comp. Ges. § 55, 1. The part. Kal denotes a judge, the part. Poel one who is accuser and judge at the same time. On such Poel-forms from strong roots, vid. on Ps. cix. 10, where wedörschu is to be read, and therefore it is written יִדְרְשִׁי in correct Codices.

- 16 *If when I called He really answered,
I could not believe that He would hearken to me ;*
17 *He would rather crush me in a tempest,
And only multiply my wounds without cause ;*
18 *He would not suffer me to take my breath,
But would fill me with bitter things.*
19 If it is a question of the strength of the strong—: "Behold here!"
And if of right—: "Who will challenge me?"
20 *Were I in the right, my mouth must condemn me ;
Were I innocent, He would declare me guilty.*

The answer of God when called upon, i.e. summoned, is represented in ver. 16a as an actual result (præt. followed by fut. consec.), therefore ver. 16b cannot be intended to express: I could not believe that He answers me, but: I could not believe that He, the answerer, would hearken to me; His infinite exaltation would not permit such condescension. The אשר which follows, ver. 17a, signifies either quippe qui or quoniam; both shades of meaning are after all blended, as in ver. 15. The question arises here whether שוף signifies conterere, or as cognate form with שחא, inhiare,—a question also of importance in the exposition of the Protevan-gelium. There are in all only three passages in which it occurs: here, Gen. iii. 15, and Ps. cxxxix. 11. In Ps. cxxxix. 11 the meaning conterere is unsuitable, but even the signification inhiare can only be adopted for want of a better: perhaps it may be explained by comparison with צעה, in the sense of obvelare, or as a denominative from נָשָׂה (the verb of which, נָשָׂה, is kindred to נָשַׁב, נָשַׁם, flare) in the signification obtenebrare. In Gen. iii. 15, if regarded superficially, the meaning inhiare and conterere are alike suitable, but the meaning inhiare deprives that utterance of God of its prophetic character, which has been recognised from the beginning; and the meaning conterere, contundere, is strongly supported by the translations. We decide in favour of this meaning also in the present passage, with the ancient translations (LXX. ἐκτρίψῃ, Targ. מְרַקֵּשׁ, comminuens). Moreover, it is the meaning most generally supported by a comparison with the dialects, whereas the signification inhiare can only be sustained by comparison with שחא and the Arabic sâfa (to sniff, track by scent, to smell); besides, “to assail angrily” (Hirz., Ewald) is an inadmissible contortion of inhiare, which signifies in a hostile sense “to seize abruptly” (Schlottm.), properly to snatch, to desire to seize.

Translate therefore: He would crush me in a tempest and multiply (multiplicaret), etc., would not let me take breath (respirare), but (בִּי, Ges. § 155, 1, e. a.) fill me (יִשְׂבִּיעֵנִי, with Pathach with Rebia mugrasch) with bitter things (מִמְרִירִים, with Dag. dirimens, which gives the word a more pathetic expression). The meaning of ver. 19 is that God stifles the attempt to maintain one's right in the very beginning by His being superior to the creature in strength, and not entering into a dispute with him concerning the right. הִנֵּה (for הִנְנִי as אֵינִי, ch. xv. 23, for אֵי): see, here I am, ready for the contest, is the word of God, similar to quis citare possit me (in Jer. xlix. 19, l. 44), which sounds as an echo of this passage. The creature must always be in the wrong,—a thought true in itself, in connection with which Job forgets that God's right in opposition to the creature is also always the true objective right. פִּי, with suffix, accented to indicate its logical connection, as ch. xv. 6: my own mouth.¹ In חִירֶקְשִׁי the Chirek of the Hiphil is shortened to a Sheva, as 1 Sam. xvii. 25; vid. Ges. § 53, rem. 4. The subject is God, not "my mouth" (Schlottm.): supposing that I were innocent, He would put me down as one morally wrong and to be rejected.

- 21 *I am innocent, I know not myself,
My life is offensive to me.*
22 *It is all the same—therefore I maintain—:
The innocent and wicked He destroyeth.*
23 *If the scourge slay suddenly,
He laugheth at the melting away of the innocent.*
24 *Countries are given into the hand of the wicked;
The countenance of their rulers He veileth—
Is it not so, who else doeth it?*

Ver. 21 is usually considered to be an affirmation of innocence on the part of Job, though without effect, and even at the peril of his own destruction: "I am innocent, I boldly say it even with scorn of my life" (Schnurr., Hirz., Ewald, Schlottm.). But although לֹא אֶרְדֵּעַ נַפְשִׁי may mean: I care nothing for my soul, i.e. my life (comp. Gen. xxxix. 6), its first meaning would be : I know not my soul, i.e. myself ; and this sense is also quite in accordance with the context. He is innocent, but the contradiction between his lot and his innocence seems to show that his self-consciousness is deceptive, and makes him a mystery to himself, leads him astray respecting himself ; and having thus become a stranger to himself, he abhors this life of seeming contradictions, for which he desires nothing less than its long continuance (vid. ch. vii. 16). The אֶחָד הֵיא which follows we do not explain : "it is all the same to me whether I live or not," but : it is all one whether man is innocent or not. He himself is a proof of this ; therefore he maintains, etc. It is, however, also possible that this expression, which is similar in meaning to Eccles. ix. 2 (there is one event, מִקְרָה אֶחָד, to the righteous and to the wicked), and is well translated in the Targ. by חֲדָא מִכִּילָא הֵיא (there is one measure of retribution, מִכִּילָא = מִדָּה, μέτρον, Matt. vii. 2), refers to what follows, and that "therefore I maintain" is parenthetical (like אִמְרָתִי, Ps. cxix. 57 ; לִי אֵמַר, Isa. xlv. 24), and we have translated it accordingly. There is certainly a kind of suspense, and עַל-כֵּן introduces an assertion of Job, which is founded upon the fact of the continuance of his own misfortune,—an assertion which he advances in direct contradiction to the friends, and which is expressly censured by Elihu.

In vers. 23 sq., by some striking examples, he completes the description of that which seems to be supported by the conflict he is called to endure. שׁוֹט, a scourge, signifies a judgment which passes over a nation (Isa. xxviii. 15). It sweeps off the guiltless as well, and therefore Job concludes that God delights in מִסָּה, πειρασμός, trial (compare above, p. 7, note), or perhaps more correctly the melting away (from מָסַם, as ch. vi. 14) of the guiltless, i.e. their dissolution in anguish and dismay, their wearing away and despondency. Jerome rightly remarks that in the whole book Job says nihil asperius than what he says in ver. 23. Another example in favour of his disconsolate אָחַת הֵיאֵה is that whole lands are given into the hand of the wicked: the monarch is an evil man, and the countenance of their judges He (God) covers, so that they do not distinguish between right and wrong, nor decide in favour of the former rather than of the latter. God himself is the final cause of the whole: if not, i.e. if it is not so, who can it then be that causes it? אָפּוּ (four times in the book of Job instead of the usual form אָפּוֹ) is, according to the current opinion, placed per hyperbaton in the conditional instead of the interrogative clause; for אָפּוּ מִי are certainly not, with Hirzel, to be taken together. There is, however, not a proper hyperbaton, but אָפּוּ here gives intensity to the question; though not directly as ch. xvii. 15 (Ges. § 153, 2), but only indirectly, by giving intensity to that which introduces the question, as ch. xxiv. 25 and Gen. xxvii. 37; translate therefore: if it really is not so (comp. the Homeric expression εἰ δ' ἄγε). It is indisputable that God, and no one else, is the final cause of this misery, apparently so full of contradiction, which meets us in the history of mankind, and which Job now experiences in himself.

- 25 *My days were swifter than a runner,
They fled away without seeing prosperity,*
26 *They shot by as ships of reeds,
As an eagle which dasheth upon its prey.*
27 *If my thought is: I will forget my complaint,
I will give up my dark looks and look cheerful;*
28 *I shudder at all my pains,
I feel that Thou dost not pronounce me innocent.*

Such, as described in the preceding strophe, is the lot of the innocent in general, and such (this is the connection) is also Job's lot: his swiftly passing life comes to an end amidst suffering, as that of an evil-doer whom God cuts off in judgment. In the midst of his present sufferings he has entirely forgotten his former prosperity; it is no happiness to him, because the very enjoyment of it makes the loss of it more grievous to bear. The days of prosperity are gone, have passed swiftly away without טובה, i.e. without lasting prosperity. They have been swifter מְנִי רָץ. By reference to ch. vii. 6, this might be considered as a figure borrowed from the weaver's loom, since in the Coptic the threads of the weft (fila subteminis) which are wound round the shuttle are called "runners" (vid. Ges. Thesaurus); but Rosenmüller has correctly observed that, in order to describe the fleetness of his life, Job brings together that which is swiftest on land (the runners or couriers), in water (fast-sailing ships), and in the air (the swooping eagle). עָם, ver. 26a, signifies, in comparison with, æque ac. But we possess only a rather uncertain tradition as to the kind of vessels meant by אֲנִיּוֹת אֵבֶה. Jerome translates, after the Targ.: naves poma portantes, by which one may understand the small vessels, according to Edrisi, common on the Dead Sea, in which corn and different kinds of fruits were carried from Zoar to Jericho and to other regions of the Jordan (Stickel, S. 267); but if אֵבֶה were connected with אֵב, we might rather expect אֵבֶה, after the form אֵשָׁה (from אֵשׁ), instead of אֲנִיּוֹת. Others derive the word from אֵבֶה, avere: ships of desire, i.e. full-rigged and ready for sea (Gecatilia in Ges. Thes. suppl. p. 62), or struggling towards the goal (Kimchi), or steering towards (Zamora), and consequently hastening to (Symmachus, σπενδούσας), the harbour; but independently of the explanation not being suited to the description, it should then be accented ēbēh, after the form נִדְּהָ, קִצָּה, instead of ēbēh. The explanation, ships of hostility (Syr.¹), i.e. ships belonging to pirates or freebooters, privateers, which would suit the subject well, is still less admissible with the present pointing of the text, as it must then be אִיבָּה (אִיבָּה), with which the Egyptian uba, against, and adverse (contrarius), may be compared. According to Abulwalid (Parchon, Raschi), אִיבָּה is the name of a large river near the scene of the book of Job; which may be understood as either the Babylonian name for river אִיבָּה, or the Abyssinian name of the Nile, abâi; and אִיבָּה may be compared with לִבְנָה in relation to the Arabic, lubna. But a far more satisfactory explanation is the one now generally received, according to the comparison with the Arabic أَبَا, a reed (whence abaa-t-un, a reed, a so-called n. unitatis):

ships made from reeds, like כִּלְיָי נִמָּא, Isa. xviii. 2, vessels of papyrus, βαρίδες παπύριναί. In such small ships, with Egyptian tackling, they used to travel as far as Taprobane. These canoes were made to fold together, plicatiles, so that they could be carried past the cataracts; Heliodorus describes them as ὀξύδρομώτατα.¹

The third figure is the eagle, which swoops down upon its prey; טוּשׁ, like Chaldee טוּשׁ, by which the Targ. translates חֵשׁ, Hab. i. 8; Grätz' conjecture of יָשׁוּט (which is intended to mean flutters) is superfluous. Just as unnecessary is it, with Olshausen, to change אָמַרְי אֶם into אֶם אִמְרָתִי: "if my saying (thinking)" is equivalent to, "as often as I say (think)." פָּנִים is here (as in the German phrase, ein Gesicht machen) an ill-humoured, distorted, wry face. When Job desires to give up this look of suffering and be cheerful (הבליג, like ch. x. 20, hilaritatem præ se ferre, vultum hilarem induere), the certainty that he is not favoured of God, and consequently that he cannot be delivered from his sufferings, all his anguish in spite of his struggles against it comes ever afresh before his mind. It is scarcely necessary to remark that תנקני is addressed to God, not to Bildad. It is important to notice that Job does not speak of God without at the same time looking up to Him as in prayer. Although he feels rejected of God, he still remains true to God. In the following strophe he continues to complain of God, but without denying Him.

29 If I must be wicked, why do I exert myself in vain?

30 *If I should wash myself with snow water,
And make my hands clean with lye,*

31 *Then Thou wouldst plunge me into the pit,
And my clothes would abhor me.*

32 *For He is not a man as I, that I should answer Him,
That we should go together to judgment.*

33 *There is not an arbitrator between us
Who should lay his hand upon us both.*

The clause with strongly accented "I" affirms that in relation to God he is from the first, and unchangeably, a wicked, i.e. guilty, man (Ps. cix. 7) (רָשָׁע, to be a wicked man, means either to act as such (ch. x. 15), or to appear as such, be accounted as such, as here and ch. x. 7; Hiph., ver. 20, to condemn). Why, therefore, should he vainly (הֶבֶל, acc. adv., like breath, useless) exert himself by crying for help, and basing his plaint on his innocence? In ver. 30a the Chethib is בָּמוֹ, the Keri בְּמִי, as the reverse in Isa. xxv. 10; mo itself appears in the signification water (Egyptian muau), in the proper names Moab and Moshe (according to Jablonsky, ex aqua servatus); in בָּמוֹ, however, the mo may be understood according to Ges. § 103, 2. This is the meaning—no cleansing, even though he should use snow and בר (a vegetable alkali), i.e. not even the best-grounded self-justification can avail him, for God would still bring it to pass, that his clearly proved innocence should change to the most horrible impurity. Ewald, Rödiger, and others translate incorrectly: my clothes would make me disgusting. The idea is tame. The Piel הָעֵב signifies elsewhere in the book (ch. xix. 19, xxx. 10) to abhor, not to make abhorrent; and the causative meaning is indeed questionable, for מְהַעֵב (Isa. xlix. 7) signifies loathing, as מְכַסֶּה (ch. xxiii. 18) covering, and Ezek. xvi. 25 certainly borders on the signification “to make detestable,” but הָעֵב may also be in the primary meaning, abominari, the strongest expression for that contempt of the beauty bestowed by God which manifests itself by prostitution. Translate: My clothes would abhor me; which does not mean: I should be disgusted with myself (Hirzel); Job is rather represented as naked; him, the naked one, God would—says he—so plunge into the pit that his clothes would conceive a horror of him, i.e. start back in terror at the idea of being put on and defiled by such a horrible creature (Schlottm., Oehler). For God is not his equal, standing on the same level with him: He, the Absolute Being, is accuser and judge in one person; there is between them no arbitrator who (or: that he) should lay, etc. Mercier correctly explains: impositio manus est potestatis signum; the meaning therefore is: qui utrumque nostrum velut manu imposita coerceat.

34 *Let Him take away His rod from me,
And let His terrors not stupify me.*

35 *Then I would speak and not fear Him,
For not thus do I stand with myself.*

Ch. x. 1 *My soul is full of disgust with my life,
Therefore I will freely utter my complaint;*

I will speak in the bitterness of my soul.

2 I will say to Eloah : Condemn me not ;

Let me know wherefore Thou contendest with me !

The two Optatives, vers. 34 sq., as is frequently the case with the Imper., are followed by the Cohortative as the conclusion (אֲדַבֵּר, therefore will I speak; whereas וְאֲדַבֵּר might be equivalent to, in order that I may speak) of a conditional antecedent clause. יִשָּׁבֵט is here the rod with which God smites Job; comp. ch. xiii. 21. If God would only remove his pain from him for a brief space, so that he might recover himself for self-defence, and if He would not stifle his words as they come freely forth from his lips by confronting him with His overwhelming majesty, then he would fearlessly express himself; for “not thus am I in myself,” i.e. I am not conscious of such a moral condition as compels me to remain dumb before Him. However, we must inquire whether, according to the context, this special reference and shade of meaning is to be given to לֹא־כֵן. There is a use of כֵּן = nothing, when accompanied by a gesture expressive of contemptuous rejection, Num. xiii. 33 (כַּמֶּרְכָן, Isa. li. 6, as nothing);¹ and a use of לֹא־כֵן = not only so = not so small, so useless, 2 Sam. xxiii. 5, accompanied by a gesture expressive of the denial of such contempt, according to which the present passage may probably be explained: I am in myself, i.e. according to the testimony of my conscience, not so, i.e. not so morally worthless and devoid of right.

His self-consciousness makes him desire that the possibility of answering for himself might be granted him; and since he is weary of life, and has renounced all claim for its continuance, he will at least give his complaints free course, and pray the Author of his sufferings that He would not permit him to die the death of the wicked, contrary to the testimony of his own conscience. נִקְטָה is equivalent to נִקְטָה, Ezek. vi. 9, after the usual manner of the contraction of double Ayin verbs (Gen. xi. 6, 7; Isa. xix. 3; Judg. v. 5; Ezek. xli. 7; vid. Ges. § 67, rem. 11); it may nevertheless be derived directly from נִקְטָה, for this secondary verb formed from the Niph. נִקְטָה is supported by the Aramaic. In like manner, in Gen. xvii. 11 perhaps a secondary verb נִמְלָה, and certainly in Gen. ix. 19 and Isa. xxxiii. 3 a secondary verb נִפְיָה (1 Sam. xiii. 11), formed from the Niph. נִפְיָה (Gen. x. 18), is to be supposed; for the contraction of the Niphal form נִקְטָה into נִקְטָה is impossible; and the supposition which has been advanced, of a root נִפְיָה = נִפְיָה in the signification diffundere, dissipare is unnecessary. His soul is disgusted (fastidio affecta est, or fastidit) with his life, therefore he will give free course to his complaint (comp. ch. vii. 11). עָלַי is not super or de me, but, as ch. xxx. 16, in me; it belongs to the Ego, as an expression of spontaneity: I in myself, since the Ego is the subject, ὑποκείμενον, of his individuality (Psychol. pp. 179 sq.). The inner man is meant, which has the Ego over or in itself; from this the complaint shall issue forth as a stream without restraint; not, however, a mere gloomy lamentation over his pain, but a supplicatory complaint directed to God respecting the peculiar pang of his suffering, viz. this stroke which seems to come upon him from his Judge (רִיב, seq. acc., as Isa. xxvii. 8), without his being conscious of that for which he is accounted guilty.

- 3 *Doth it please Thee when Thou oppressest,
That Thou rejectest the work of Thy hands,
While Thou shinest upon the counsel of the wicked?*
- 4 Hast Thou eyes of flesh,

- Or seest Thou as a mortal seeth?*
 5 Are Thy days as the days of a mortal,
Or Thy years as man's days,
 6 That Thou seekest after my iniquity,
And searchest after my sin?
 7 Although Thou knowest that I am not a wicked man,
And there is none that can deliver out of Thy hand.

There are three questions by which Job seeks to exhaust every possible way of accounting for his sufferings as coming from God. These attempts at explanation, however, are at once destroyed, because they proceed upon conceptions which are unworthy of God, and opposed to His nature. Firstly, Whether it gives Him pleasure (טוב, agreeable, as ch. xiii. 9) when He oppresses, when He despises, i.e. keeps down forcibly or casts from Him as hateful (רע, as Ps. lxxxix. 39, Isa. liv. 6) the work of His hand; while, on the contrary, He permits light to shine from above upon the design of the wicked, i.e. favours it? Man is called the יְיָ of the divine hands, as though he were elaborated by them, because at his origin (Gen. ii. 7), the continuation of which is the development in the womb (Ps. cxxxix. 15), he came into existence in a remarkable manner by the directly personal, careful, and, so to speak, skilful working of God. That it is the morally innocent which is here described, may be seen not only from the contrast (ver. 3c), but also from the fact that he only can be spoken of as oppressed and rejected. Moreover, "the work of Thy hands" involves a negative reply to the question. Such an unloving mood of self-satisfaction is contrary to the bounty and beneficence of that love to which man owes his existence. Secondly, Whether God has eyes of flesh, i.e. of sense, which regard only the outward appearance, without an insight into the inner nature, or whether He sees as mortals see, i.e. judges, κατὰ τὴν σάρκα (John viii. 15)? Mercier correctly: num ex facie judicas, ut affectibus ducaris more hominum. This question also supplies its own negative; it is based upon the thought that God looketh on the heart (1 Sam. xvi. 7). Thirdly, Whether His life is like to the brevity of man's life, so that He is not able to wait until a man's sin manifests itself, but must institute such a painful course of investigation with him, in order to extort from him as quickly as possible a confession of it? Suffering appears here to be a means of inquisition, which is followed by the final judgment when the guilt is proved. What is added in ver. 7 puts this supposition aside also as inconceivable. Such a mode of proceeding may be conceived of in a mortal ruler, who, on account of his short-sightedness, seeks to bring about by severe measures that which was at first only conjecture, and who, from the apprehension that he may not witness that vengeance in which he delights, hastens forward the criminal process as much as possible, in order that his victim may not escape him. God, however, to whom belongs absolute knowledge and absolute power, would act thus, although, etc. ^{לע}, although, notwithstanding (proceeding from the signification, besides, insuper), as ch. xvi. 17 (Isa. liii. 9), xxxiv. 6. God knows even from the first that he (Job) will not appear as a guilty person (^{לע}, as in ch. ix. 29); and however that may be, He is at all events sure of him, for nothing escapes the hand of God.

That operation of the divine love which is first echoed in "the labour of Thy hands," is taken up in the following strophe, and, as Job contemplates it, his present lot seems to him quite incomprehensible.

8 Thy hands have formed and perfected me Altogether round about, and Thou hast now swallowed me up!

- 9 *Consider now, that Thou hast perfected me as clay,
And wilt Thou turn me again into dust?*
- 10 *Hast Thou not poured me out as milk,
And curdled me as curd?*
- 11 *With skin and flesh hast Thou clothed me,
And Thou hast intertwined me with bones and sinews;*
- 12 *Life and favour Thou hast shown me,
And Thy care hath guarded my breath.*

The development of the embryo was regarded by the Israelitish Chokma as one of the greatest mysteries (Eccles. xi. 5; 2 Macc. vii. 22 sq.). There are two poetical passages which treat explicitly of this mysterious existence: this strophe of the book of Job, and the Psalm by David, cxxxix. 13-16 (Psychol. p. 248). The assertion of Scheuchzer, Hoffmann, and Oetinger, that these passages of Scripture "include, and indeed go beyond, all recent systemata generationis," attributes to Scripture a design of imparting instruction,—a purpose which is foreign to it. Scripture nowhere attempts an analysis of the workings of nature, but only traces them back to their final cause. According to the view of Scripture, a creative act similar to the creation of Adam is repeated at the origin of each individual; and the continuation of development according to natural laws is not less the working of God than the creative planting of the very beginning. Thy hands, says Job, have formed (עָצַב, to cut, carve, fashion; cognate are קָצַב, קָצַב, without the accompanying notion of toil, which makes this word specially appropriate, as describing the fashioning of the complicated nature of man) and perfected me. We do not translate: made; for עָשָׂה stands in the same relation to בָּרָא and יָצַר as perficere to creare and ingere (Gen. ii. 2; Isa. xliii. 7). יָדָךְ refers to the members of the body collectively, and קָרְבִּי to the whole form. The perfecting as clay implies three things: the earthiness of the substance, the origin of man without his knowledge and co-operation, and the moulding of the shapeless substance by divine power and wisdom. The primal origin of man, de limo terræ (ch. xxxiii. 6; Ps. cxxxix. 15), is repeated in the womb. The figures which follow (ver. 10) describe this origin, which being obscure is all the more mysterious, and glorifies the power of God the more. The sperma is likened to milk; the הַחֵי (used elsewhere of smelting), which Seb. Schmid rightly explains rem colliquatam fundere et immittere in formam aliquam, refers to the nisus formativus which dwells in it. The embryo which is formed from the sperma is likened to נֶבֶלֶה, which means in all the Semitic dialects cheese (curd). "As whey" (Ewald, Hahn) is not suitable; whey does not curdle; in making cheese it is allowed to run off from the curdled milk. "As cream" (Schlottm.) is not less incorrect; cream is not lac coagulatum, which the word signifies. The embryo forming itself from the sperma is like milk which is curdled and beaten into shape.

The consecutio temporum, moreover, must be observed here. It is, for example, incorrect to translate, with Ewald: Dost Thou not let me flow away like milk, etc. Job looks back to the beginning of his life; the four clauses, vers. 10, 11, under the control of the first two verbs (ver. 8), which influence the whole strophe, are also retrospective in meaning. The futt. are consequently like synchronous imperff.; as, then, ver. 12 returns to perff., ver. 11 describes the development of the embryo to the full-grown infant, on which Grotius remarks: Hic ordo est in genitura: primum pellicula fit, deinde in ea caro, duriora paulatim accedunt, and by ver. 12, the manifestations of divine goodness, not only in the womb, but from the beginning of life and onwards, are intended. The expression "Life and favour (this combination does not occur elsewhere) hast Thou done to me" is zeugmatic: He has given him life, and sustained that life amidst constant proofs of favour; His care has guarded the spirit (רוח), by which his frame becomes a living and self-conscious being. This grateful retrospect is interspersed with painful reflections, in which Job gives utterance to his feeling of the contrast between the manifestation of the divine goodness which he had hitherto experienced and his present condition. As in ver. 8b., וַיִּכְבֵּלֵנִי, which Hirzel wrongly translates: and wilt now destroy me; it is rather: and hast now swallowed me up, i.e. drawn me down into destruction, as it were brought me to nought; or even, if in the fut. consec., as is frequently the case, the consecutive and not the aorist signification preponderates: and now swallowest me up; and in ver. 9 (where, though not clear from the syntax, it is clear from the substance that תִּשְׁבִּינִי is not to be understood as an imperfect, like the futt. in vers. 10 sq.): wilt Thou cause me to become dust again? The same tone is continued in the following strophe. Thus graciously has he been brought into being, and his life sustained, in order that he may come to such a terrible end.

- 13 *And such Thou hast hidden in Thy heart,
I perceive that this was in Thy mind:*
- 14 *If I should sin, Thou wouldst take note of it,
And not acquit me of my iniquity.*
- 15 *If I should act wickedly, woe unto me!
And were I righteous, I should not lift up my head,
Being full of shame and conscious of my misery.*
- 16 *And were I to raise it, Thou wouldst hunt me as a lion,
And ever display on me Thy wondrous power,*
- 17 *Thou wouldst ever bring fresh witnesses against me,
And increase Thy wrath against me,
I should be compelled to withstand continuously advancing troops and a host.*

This manifestation of divine goodness which Job has experienced from the earliest existence seems to him, as he compares his present lot of suffering with it, to have served as a veil to a hidden purpose of a totally opposite character. That purpose—to make this life, which has been so graciously called into existence and guarded thus far, the object of the severest and most condemning visitation—is now manifest. Both וְאַתָּה and וְזֹאת refer to what is to follow; וְזֹאת עִמָּךְ used of the thought conceived, the purpose cherished, as ch. xxiii. 14, xxvii. 11. All that follows receives a future colouring from this principal clause, “This is what Thou hadst designed to do,” which rules the strophe. Thus ver. 14a is to be rendered: If I had sinned, Thou wouldst have kept me in remembrance, properly custodies me, which is here equivalent to custoditurus eras me. שָׁמַר, with the acc. of the person, according to Ps. cxxx. 3 (where it is followed by the acc. of the sin), is to be understood: to keep any one in remembrance, i.e. to mark him as sinful (Hirzel). This appears more appropriate than rigide observaturus eras me (Schlottm.). וְשָׁמַרְתִּי, according to Ges. § 121, 4, might be taken for וְשָׁמַרְתָּ לִּי (viz. חֲפָצָאִי); but this is unnecessary, and we have merely translated it thus for the sake of clearness. His infirmities must not be passed by unpunished; and if he should act wickedly (רָשָׁע, of malignant sin, in distinction from חַטָּא), woe unto him (comp. οἰαί μοι, 1 Cor. ix. 16). According to the construction referred to above, וְצַדִּיקְתִּי is præt. hypotheticum (Ges. § 155, 4, a); and the conclusion follows without waw apodosis: If I had acted rightly, I should not have raised my head, being full of shame and conscious of my misery. The adjectives are not in apposition to רָאשִׁי (Böttcher), but describe the condition into which he would be brought, instead of being able (according to the ethical principle, Gen. iv. 7) to raise his head cheerfully. רָאָה constr. of רָאָה, as שָׁבַע of שָׁבַע. It is needless, with Pisc., Hirz., Böttch., and Ewald, to alter it to רָאָה, since רָאָה is a verbal adjective like יָפָה, נָכָה, קָשָׁה. Moreover, וְרָאָה cannot be imperative (Rosenm., De Wette); for although imperatives, joined by waw to sentences of a different construction, do occur (Ps. lxxvii. 2; 2 Sam. xxi. 3), such an exclamation would destroy the connection and tone of the strophe in the present case.

Ver. 16. וְיִאָּזַן is hypothetical, like וְצִדְקָתִי, but put in the future form, because referring to a voluntary act (Ewald, § 357, b): and if it (the head) would (nevertheless) exalt itself (נָאָה, to raise proudly or in joyous self-consciousness), then (without waw apod., which is found in other passages, e.g. ch. xxii. 28) Thou wouldst hunt me like a shachal (vid. ch. iv. 10),—Job likens God to the lion (as Hos. v. 14, xiii. 7), and himself to the prey which the lion pursues,—Thou wouldst ever anew show Thyself wonderful at my expense (הִשְׁתַּבַּח, voluntative form, followed by a future with which it is connected adverbially, Ges. § 142, 3, b; הִתְפַּלֵּא, with ā in the last syllable, although not in pause, as Num. xix. 12; Ewald, § 141, c.), i.e. wonderful in power, and inventive by ever new forms of suffering, by which I should be compelled to repent this haughtiness. The witnesses (עֲרִים) that God continually brings forth afresh against him are his sufferings (vid. ch. xvi. 8), which, while he is conscious of his innocence, declare him to be a sinner; for Job, like the friends, cannot think of suffering and sin otherwise than as connected one with the other: suffering is partly the result of sin, and partly it sets the mark of sin on the man who is no sinner. תִּרְבַּ (fut. apoc. Hiph. Ges. § 75, rem. 15) is also the voluntative form: Thou wouldst multiply, increase Thy malignity against me. עַם, contra, as also in other passages with words denoting strife and war, ch. xiii. 19, xxiii. 6, xxxi. 13; or where the context implies hostility, Ps. lv. 19, xciv. 16. The last line is a clause by itself consisting of nouns. הַלִּיפּוֹת וְצָבָא is considered by all modern expositors as hendiadys, as Mercier translates: impetor variis et sibi succedentibus malorum agminibus; and צָבָא is mostly taken collectively. Changes and hosts = hosts continuously dispersing themselves, and always coming on afresh to the attack. But is not this form of expression unnatural? By חֲלִיפֹת Job means the advancing troops, and by צֶבֶא the main body of the army, from which they are reinforced; the former stands first, because the thought figuratively expressed in תַּחֲרֹשׁ and חֲרִיב is continued (comp. ch. xix. 12): the enmity of God is manifested against him by ever fresh sufferings, which are added to the one chief affliction. Böttcher calls attention to the fact that all the lines from ver. 14 end in î, a rhythm formed by the inflection, which is also continued in ver. 18. This repetition of the pronominal suffix gives intensity to the impression that these manifestations of the divine wrath have special reference to himself individually.

18 And wherefore hast Thou brought me forth out of the womb?

I should have expired, that no eye had seen me,

19 *I should have been as though I had never been,
Carried from the womb to the grave.*

20 *Are not my days few? then cease
And turn from me, that I may become a little cheerful,*

21 *Before I go to return no more
Into the land of darkness and of the shadow of death,*

22 *The land of deep darkness like to midnight,
Of the shadow of death and of confusion,
And which is bright like midnight.*

The question Wherefore? ver. 18a, is followed by futt as modi conditionales (Ges. § 127, 5) of that which would and should have happened, if God had not permitted him to be born alive: I should have expired, prop. I ought to expire, conceiving himself as put back to the time of birth (comp. ch. iii. 13, where the præt. more objectively expressed what would then have happened). These modi condit. are continued in ver. 19:

I should have been (sc. in the womb) as though I had not been (comp. the short elliptical¹ expression, Obad. ver. 16), i.e. as one who had scarcely entered upon existence, and that only of the earliest (as at conception); I should have been carried (הַנִּבֵּל, as ch. xxi. 32) from the womb (without seeing the light as one born alive) to the grave. This detestation of his existence passes into the wish, ver. 20, that God would be pleased at least somewhat to relieve him ere he is swallowed up by the night of Hades. We must neither with the Targ. translate: are not my days few, and vanishing away? nor with Oetinger: will not my fewness of days cease? Both are contrary to the correct accentuation. Olshausen thinks it remarkable that there is not a weaker pausal accent to יָמַי; but such a one is really indirectly there, for Munach is here equivalent to Dechi, from which it is formed (vid. the rule in Comm. über den Psalter, ii. 504). Accordingly, Seb. Schmid correctly translates: nonne parum dies mei? ideo cessa. The Keri substitutes the precativ form of expression for the optative: cease then, turn away from me then (imper. consec. with waw of the result, Ewald, § 235, a); comp. the precativ conclusion to the speech, ch. vii. 16, but there is no real reason for changing the optative form of the text. יֵשִׁית (voluntative for יֵשֶׁת, ch. ix. 33) may be supplemented by יָדוּ, פָּנִיו, עֵינָיו, or לָבוּ (ch. vii. 17) (not, however, with Hirz., שְׁבִטוּ, after ch. ix. 34, which is too far-fetched for the usage of the language, or with Böttch., מִחֲנֹהוּ, copias suas); יֵשִׁית can however, like שִׁים, ch. iv. 20, signify to turn one's self to, se disponere = to attend to, consequently שִׁית מִן, to turn the attention from, as שְׁעָה מִן, ch. vii. 19, Ps. xxxix. 14 (where, as here, וַאֲבִלְיָנָה follows).

He desires a momentary alleviation of his sufferings and ease before his descent to Hades, which seems so near at hand. He calls Hades the land of darkness and of the shadow of death. צִלְמוֹת, which occurs for the first time in the Old Testament in Ps. xxiii. 4, is made into a compound from צִלְמוֹת, and is the proper word for the obscurity of the region of the dead, and is accordingly repeated later on. Further, he calls it the land of encircling darkness (עֲפָתָה, defective for עִפְתָּה, from עוּף, caligare, and with He parag. intensive for עִיפָה, in Amos iv. 13, who also uses הַבְּלִיג, ch. v. 9, in common with Job), like midnight darkness. אֶפֶל cannot mean merely the grey of twilight, it is the entire absence of sunlight, ch. iii. 6, xxviii. 3, Ps. xci. 6; comp. Ex. x. 22, where the Egyptian darkness is called חֹשֶׁךְ אֶפֶלָה. Böttch. correctly compares אֶפֶל and נֶפֶל: mersa ad imum h.e. profunda nox (the advancing night). Still further he calls it (the land) of the shadow of death, and devoid of order (סִדְרִים, ἄπ. λεγ. in the Old Testament, but a common word in the later Hebrew), i.e. where everything is so encompassed by the shadow of death that it seems a chaos, without any visible or distinct outline. It is difficult to determine whether וְחִפֵּעַ is to be referred to אֶרֶץ: and which lights (fut. consec. as the accent on the penult. indicates, the syntax like ch. iii. 21, 23, Isa. lvii. 3); or is to be taken as neuter: and it shines there (= and where it shines) like midnight darkness. Since הוֹפֵיעַ (from יָפַע = וָפַע, to rise, shine forth; vid. on Ps. xcv. 4), as also הָאִיר, does not occur elsewhere as neuter, we prefer, with Hirzel, to refer it to אֶרֶץ, as being more certain. Moreover, אֶפֶל is here evidently the intensest darkness, ipsum medullitium umbræ mortis ejusque intensissimum, as Oetinger expresses it. That which is there called light, i.e. the faintest degree of darkness, is like the midnight of this world; “not light, but darkness visible,” as Milton says of hell.

In this speech (ch. ix. x.) Job for the first time discusses the principle on which the attack of the friends is founded.

It is primarily directed against Bildad, but applies also to Eliphaz, for the two hold the same opinion. Therefore, because in the first part of the speech Job does not expressly address him or all the friends, it cannot, with Ewald, be said that it bears the characteristics of a soliloquy. To ch. ix. 28 Job inclines towards the friends; and when he afterwards addresses God, all that he says to God is affected by the manner in which the friends have advanced against him.

The maxim of the friends is: God does not pervert right, i.e. He deals justly in all that He does. They conclude from this, that no man, no sufferer, dare justify himself: it is his duty to humble himself under the just hand of God. Job assents to all this, but his assent is mere sarcasm at what they say. He admits that everything that God does is right, and must be acknowledged as right; not, however, because it is right in itself, but because it is the act of the absolute God, against whom no protest uttered by the creature, though with the clearest conviction of innocence, can avail. Job separates goodness from God, and regards that which is part of His very being as a product of His arbitrary will. What God says and does must be true and right, even if it be not true and right in itself. The God represented by the friends is a God of absolute justice; the God of Job is a God of absolute power. The former deals according to the objective rule of right; the latter according to a freedom which, because removed from all moral restraint, is pure caprice.

How is it that Job entertains such a cheerless view of the matter? The friends, by the strong view which they have taken up, urge him into another extreme. On their part, they imagine that in the justice of God they have a principle which is sufficient to account for all the misfortunes of mankind, and Job's in particular. They maintain, with respect to mankind in general (Eliphaz by an example from his own observation, and Bildad by calling to his aid the wisdom of the ancients), that the ungodly, though prosperous for a time, come to a fearful end ; with respect to Job, that his affliction is a just chastisement from God, although designed for his good. Against the one assertion Job's own experience of life rebels ; against the other his consciousness rises up with indignation. Job's observation is really as correct as that of the friends ; for the history of the past and of the present furnishes as many illustrations of judgments which have suddenly come upon the godless in the height of their prosperity, as of general visitations in which the innocent have suffered with the guilty, by whom these judgments have been incurred. But with regard to his misfortune, Job cannot and ought not to look at it from the standpoint of the divine justice. For the proposition, which we will give in the words of Brentius, quidquid post fidei justificationem pio acciderit, innocenti accidit, is applicable to our present subject.

If, then, Job's suffering were not so severe, and his faith so powerfully shaken, he would comfort himself with the thought that the divine ways are unsearchable ; since, on the one hand, he cannot deny the many traces of the justice of the divine government in the world (he does not deny them even here), and on the other hand, is perplexed by the equally numerous incongruities of human destiny with the divine justice. (This thought is rendered more consolatory to us by the revelation which we possess of the future life ; although even in the later Old Testament times the last judgment is referred to as the adjustment of all these incongruities ; vid. the conclusion of Ecclesiastes.) His own lot might have remained always inexplicable to him, without his being obliged on that account to lose the consciousness of the divine love, and that faith like Asaph's, which, as Luther says, struggles towards God through wrath and disfavour, as through thorns, yea, even through spears and swords.

Job is passing through conflict and temptation. He does not perceive the divine motive and purpose of his suffering, nor has he that firm and unshaken faith which will keep him from mistaken views of God, although His dispensations are an enigma to him; but, as his first speech (ch. iii.) shows, he is tormented by thoughts which form part of the conflict of temptation. The image of the gracious God is hidden from him, he feels only the working of the divine wrath, and asks, Wherefore doth God give light to the suffering ones?—a question which must not greatly surprise us, for, as Luther says, “There has never been any one so holy that he has not been tormented with this quare, quare, Wherefore? wherefore should it be so?” And when the friends, who know as little as Job himself about the right solution of this mystery, censure him for his inquiry, and think that in the propositions: man has no righteousness which he can maintain before God, and God does not pervert the right, they have found the key to the mystery, the conflict becomes fiercer for Job, because the justice of God furnishes him with no satisfactory explanation of his own lot, or of the afflictions of mankind generally. The justice of God, which the friends consider to be sufficient to explain everything that befalls man, Job can only regard as the right of the Supreme Being; and while it appears to the friends that every act of God is controlled by His justice, it seems to Job that whatever God does must be right, by virtue of His absolute power.

This principle, devoid of consolation, drives Job to the utterances so unworthy of him, that, in spite of his conviction of his innocence, he must appear guilty before God, because he must be speechless before His terrible majesty,—that if, however, God would only for once so meet him that he could fearlessly address Him, he would know well enough how to defend himself (ch. ix.). After these utterances of his feeling, from which all consciousness of the divine love is absent, he puts forth the touching prayer: Condemn me not without letting me know why Thou dost attack me! (ch. x. 1-7.) As he looks back, he is obliged to praise God, as his Creator and Preserver, for what He has hitherto done for him (ch. x. 8-12); but as he thinks of his present condition, he sees that from the very beginning God designed to vent His wrath upon him, to mark his infirmities, and to deprive him of all joy in the consciousness of his innocence (ch. x. 13-17). He is therefore compelled to regard God as his enemy, and this thought overpowers the remembrance of the divine goodness. If, however, God were his enemy, he might well ask, Wherefore then have I come into being? And while he writhes as a worm crushed beneath the almighty power of God, he prays that God would let him alone for a season ere he passes away into the land of darkness, whence there is no return (x. 18-22).

Brentius remarks that this speech of Job contains inferni blasphemias, and explains them thus: non enim in tanto judicii horrore Deum patrem, sed carnificem sentit; but also adds, that in passages like ch. x. 8-12 faith raises its head even in the midst of judgment; for when he praises the mercies of God, he does so spiritu fidei, and these he would not acknowledge were there not a fidei scintilla still remaining. This is true. The groundwork of Job's faith remains even in the fiercest conflict of temptation, and is continually manifest; we should be unable to understand the book unless we could see this fidei scintilla, the extinction of which would be the accomplishment of Satan's design against him, glimmering everywhere through the speeches of Job. The unworthy thoughts he entertains of God, which Brentius calls inferni blasphemias, are nowhere indulged to such a length that Job charges God with being his enemy, although he fancies Him to be an enraged foe. In spite of the imagined enmity of God against him, Job nowhere goes so far as to declare enmity on his part against God, so far as בִּרְךָ אֱלֹהִים. He does not turn away from God, but inclines to Him in prayer. His soul is filled with adoration of God, and with reverence of His power and majesty; he can clearly discern God's marvellous works in nature and among men, and His creative power and gracious providence, the workings of which he has himself experienced. But that mystery, which the friends have made still more mysterious, has cast a dark cloud over his vision, so that he can no longer behold the loving countenance of God. His faith is unable to disperse this cloud, and so he sees but one side of the divine character—His Almightyness. Since he consequently looks upon God as the Almighty and the Wrathful One, his feeling alternately manifests itself under two equally tragical phases. At one time he exalts himself in his consciousness of the justice of his cause, to sink back again before the majesty of God, to whom he must nevertheless succumb; at another time his feeling of self-confidence is overpowered by the severity of his suffering, and he betakes himself to importunate supplication.

It is true that Job, so long as he regards his sufferings as a dispensation of divine judgment, is as unjust towards God as he believes God to be unjust towards him; but if we bear in mind that this state of conflict and temptation does not preclude the idea of a temporal withdrawal of faith, and that, as Baumgarten (Pentat. i. 209) aptly expresses it, the profound secret of prayer is this, that man can prevail with the Divine Being, then we shall understand that this dark cloud need only be removed, and Job again stands before the God of love as His saint.

[Then began Zophar the Naamathite, and said:]

- 2 *Shall the torrent of words remain unanswered,
And shall the prater be in the right?*
- 3 *Shall thy vain talking silence the people,
So that thou mockest without any one putting thee to shame,*
- 4 *And sayest: my doctrine is pure,
And I am guiltless in Thine eyes?*
- 5 *But oh that Eloah would speak,
And open His lips against thee,*
- 6 *And make known to thee the secrets of wisdom,
That she is twofold in her nature—
Know then that Eloah forgetteth much of thy guilt.*

When Job has concluded his long speech, Zophar, the third and most impetuous of the friends, begins. His name, if it is to be explained according to the Arabic Esauitish name el-assfar,¹ signifies the yellow one (flavido), and the name of the place whence he comes, pleasantness (amœnitas). The very beginning of his speech is impassioned. He calls Job's speech רַב דְּבָרִים, a multitude of words (besides here, Prov. x. 19, Eccles. v. 2), and asks whether he is to remain unanswered; לֹא יַעֲנֶה, responsum non feret, from נָעַנָּה, not in the sense of being humbled, but: to be answered (of the suppliant: to be heard = to receive an answer). He calls Job אִישׁ שֹׁפָתִים, a prater (distinct from אִישׁ דְּבָרִים, a ready speaker, Ex. iv. 10), who is not in the right, whom one must not allow to have the last word. The questions, ver. 2, are followed by another which is not denoted by the sign of a question, but is only known by the accent: Shall not thy בְּרִיִּים, meaningless speeches (from בָּרַד = בָּטָא, βαττολογεῖν), put men (מְחַיִּים, like other archaisms, e.g. תַּבִּיל, always without the article) to silence, so that thou darest mock without any one making thee ashamed, i.e. leading thee on ad absurdum? Thou darest mock God (Hirzel); better Rosenmüller: nos et Deum. The mockery here meant is that which Zophar has heard in Job's long speech; mockery at his opponents, in the belief that he is right because they remain silent. The futt. consec., vers. 3 sq., describe the conduct of Job which results from this absence of contradiction. Zophar, in ver. 4, does not take up Job's own words, but means, that one had better have nothing more to do with Job, as he would some day say and think so and so, he would consider his doctrine blameless, and himself in relation to God pure. לָקַח occurs only here in this book; it is a word peculiar to the book of Proverbs (also only Deut. xxxii. 2, Isa. xxix. 24), and properly signifies the act of appropriating, then that which is presented for appropriation, i.e. for learning: the doctrine (similar to שְׁמוּעָה, the hearing, ἀκοή, and then the discourse); we see from the words "my doctrine is pure," which Zophar puts into the mouth of Job, that the controversy becomes more and more a controversy respecting known principles.

Ver. 5. With וְאֵלֶּם, verum enim vero, Zophar introduces his wish that God himself would instruct Job; this would most thoroughly refute his utterances. מִי יֵהֵן is followed by the infin., then by futt., vid. Ges. § 136, 1; כִּפְּלָיִים (only here and Isa. xl. 2) denotes not only that which is twice as great, but generally that which far surpasses something else. The subject of the clause beginning with כִּי is הָיָה understood, i.e. divine wisdom: that she is the double with respect to (לְ), as e.g. 1 Kings x. 23) reality (חַוְשִׁיהָ, as ch. v. 12, vi. 13, essentia, substantia), i.e. in comparison with Job's specious wisdom and philosophism. Instead of saying: then thou wouldst perceive, Zophar, realizing in his mind that which he has just wished, says imperiously וְרָע (an imper. consec., or, as Ewald, § 347, a, calls it, imper. futuri, similar to Gen. xx. 7, 2 Sam. xxi. 3) : thou must then perceive that God has dealt far more leniently with thee than thou hast deserved. The causative הִשָּׁה (in Old Testament only this passage, and ch. xxxix. 17) denotes here oblivioni dare, and the מן of מֵעוֹנֶיךָ is partitive.

- 7 *Canst thou find out the nature of Eloah,
And penetrate to the foundation of the existence of the Almighty?*
- 8 *It is as the heights of heaven—what wilt thou do?
Deeper than Hades—what canst thou know?*
- 9 *The measure thereof is longer than the earth,
And broader than the sea.*

The majority of modern commentators erroneously translate חָקַר searching = comprehension, and תְּכִלִּית perfection, a meaning which this word never has. The former, indeed, signifies first in an active sense : finding out by search ; and then also objectively : the object sought after : “the hidden ground” (Ewald), the depth (here and ch. xxxviii. 16 ; also, according to Ew., ch. viii. 8, of the deep innermost thought). The latter denotes penetrating to the extreme, and then the extreme, πέρas, itself (ch. xxvi. 10, xxviii. 3). In other words: the nature that underlies that which is visible as an object of search is called חָקַר; and the extreme of a thing, i.e. the end, without which the beginning and middle cannot be understood, is called תְּכִלִּית. The nature of God may be sought after, but cannot be found out ; and the end of God is unattainable, for He is both : the Perfect One, absolutus ; and the Endless One, infinitus.

Vers. 8, 9. The feminine form of expression has reference to the divine wisdom (Chokma, ver. 6), and amplifies what is there said of its transcendent reality. Its absoluteness is described by four dimensions, like the absoluteness of the love which devised the plan for man's redemption (Eph. iii.

18). The pronoun היא, with reference to this subject of the sentence, must be supplied. She is as "the heights of heaven" (comp. on subst. pro adj. ch. xxii. 12); what wilt or canst thou do in order to scale that which is high as heaven? In ver. 9a we have translated according to the reading מִדָּה with He mappic. This feminine construction is a contraction for מִדְּתָהּ, as ch. v. 13, עֲרֻמָּתָם for עֲרֻמַּתָּהּ; Zech. iv. 2, גִּלְתָּהּ for גִּלְתָּהּ, and more syncopated forms of a like kind (vid. Comm. über den Psalter, i. 225, ii. 172). The reading recorded by the Masora is, however, מִדָּה with He raph., according to which the word seems to be the accusative used adverbially; nevertheless the separation of this acc. relativus from its regens by the insertion of a word between them (comp. ch. xv. 10) would make a difficulty here where היא is wanting, and consequently מִדָּה seems to signify mensura ejus whichever way it may be written (since ah raphe is also sometimes a softened form of the suffix, ch. xxxi. 22; Ewald, § 21, f). The wisdom of God is in its height altogether inaccessible, in its depth fathomless and beyond research, in its length unbounded, in its breadth incomprehensible, stretching out far beyond all human thought.

10 When He passes by and arrests

And calls to judgment, who will oppose Him?

11 For He knoweth the men devoid of principle,

And seeth wickedness without observing it.

12 But before an empty head gaineth understanding,

An ass's foal would become a man.

In יִתְלַף God is conceived as one who manifests himself by passing to and fro in the powers of nature (in the whirlwind, Isa. xxi. 1). Should He meet with one who is guilty, and seize and bring him to judgment, who then (waw apod.) will turn Him back, i.e. restrain Him? הִקְהִיל is used of bringing to judgment, with reference to the ancient form of trial which was in public, and in which the carrying out of the sentence was partly incumbent on the people (1 Kings xxi. 9; Ezek. xvi. 40, xxiii. 46). One might almost imagine that Zophar looks upon himself and the other two friends as forming such an "assembly:" they cannot justify him in opposition to God, since He accounts him guilty. God's mode of trial is summary, because infallible: He knows altogether מִתִּי שׁוֹא, people who hypocritically disguise their moral nothingness (on this idea, vid. on Ps. xxvi. 4); and sees (looks through) אָנָּן (from the root ân, to breathe), otherwise grief, with which one pants, in a moral sense worthlessness, without any trace whatever of worth or substance. He knows and sees this moral wretchedness at once, and need not first of all reflect upon it: non opus habet, as Abenezra has correctly explained, ut diu consideret (comp. the like thought, ch. xxxiv. 23).

Ver. 12 has been variously misinterpreted. Gesenius in his *Handwörterbuch*¹ translates: but man is empty and void of understanding; but this is contrary to the accentuation, according to which אִישׁ נָבוֹב together form the subject. Olshausen translates better: an empty man, on the other hand, is without heart; but the fut. cannot be exactly so used, and if we consider that Piel has never properly a privative meaning, though sometimes a privative idea (as e.g. סָקַל, operam consumere in lapidos, scil. ejiciendos), we must regard a privative Niphal as likewise inadmissible. Stickel translates peculiarly: the man devoid of understanding is enraged against God; but this is opposed to the manifest correlation of נָבוֹב and יִלְבֵּב, which does not indicate the antithesis of an empty and sulky person (Böttcher): the former rather signifies empty, and the latter to acquire heart or marrow (Heidenheim, לֵב יִקְנֶה), so that לֵב fills up the hollow space. Hirzel's rendering partly bears out the requirement of this correlation: man has understanding like a hollow pate; but this explanation, like that of Gesenius, violates the accentuation, and produces an affected witticism. The explanation which regards ver. 12 as descriptive of the wholesome effect of the discipline of the divine judgments (comp. Isa. xxvi. 9) is far better; it does not violate the accent, and moreover is more in accordance with the future form: the empty one becomes discerning thereby, the rough, humane (thus recently Ewald, Heiligst., Schlottm.); but according to this explanation, ver. 12 is not connected with what immediately precedes, nor is the peculiarity of the expression fully brought out. Hupfeld opens up another way of interpreting the passage when he remarks, nil dicto facilius et simplicius; he understands 12*a* according to 12*b*: But man is furnished with an empty heart, i.e. receives at his birth an empty undiscerning heart, and man is born as a wild ass's colt, i.e. as stupid and obstinate. This thought is satisfactorily connected with the preceding; but here also נבוי is taken as predicate in violation of the accentuation, nor is justice done to the correlation above referred to, and the whole sentence is referred to the portion of man at his birth, in opposition to the impression conveyed by the use of the fut. Oehler appears to us to have recognised the right sense: But an empty man is as little endowed with sense, as that a wild ass should ever be born as man—be, so to speak, born again and become a man.¹

The waw in וַיֵּר is just like ch. v. 7, xii. 11, and brings into close connection the things that are to be compared, as in the form of emblematic proverbs (vid. Herzog's Real Encyklopädie, xiv. 696): the one will happen not earlier than, and as little as, the other. The Niphal נוֹלֵךְ, which in Prov. xvii. 17 signifies to become manifest, here borders on the notion of regenerari; a regeneration would be necessary if the wild ass should become human,—a regeneration which is inconceivable. It is by nature refractory, and especially when young (עֵר from עָר, fut. i in the signification vagari, huc illuc discurrere, of a young, restless, wild, frisking animal). Just so, says Zophar, the vacuum in an empty man is incapable of being filled up,—a side hit at Job, which rebounds on Zophar himself; for the dogma of the friends, which forms the sole contents of their hollowness, can indeed not fill with brightness and peace a heart that is passing through conflict. The peculiarity of the expression is no longer unintelligible: Zophar is the most impassioned of the three friends.

- 13 *But if thou wilt direct thy heart,
And spread out thy hands to Him—*
14 *If there is evil in thy hand, put it far away,
And let not wickedness dwell in thy tents—*
15 *Then indeed canst thou lift up thy face without spot,
And shalt be firm without fearing.*

The phrase הָבֵן לֵב signifies neither to raise the heart (Ewald), nor to establish it (Hirz.), but to direct it, i.e. give it the right direction (Ps. lxxviii. 8) towards God, 1 Sam. vii. 3, 2 Chron. xx. 33; it has an independent meaning, so that there is no need to supply אֶל-אֵל, nor take וּפָרִשְׁתָּ to be for לְבָרִישׁ (after the construction in 2 Chron. xxx. 19). To spread out the hands in prayer is פָּרִשׁ (פָּרֵשׁ) כַּפַּיִם; יָדַיִם is seldom used instead of the more artistic כַּפַּיִם, palmas, h.e. manus supinas. The conditional antecedent clause is immediately followed, ver. 14, by a similarly conditional parenthetical clause, which inserts the indispensable condition of acceptable prayer; the conclusion might begin with הִרְחִיקֶהוּ : when thou sendest forth thy heart and spreadest out thy hands to Him, if there is wickedness in thy hand, put it far away; but the antecedent requires a promise for its conclusion, and the more so since the præt. and fut. which follow אִם, ver. 13, have the force of futt. exact. : si disposueris et extenderis, to which the conclusion: put it far away, is not suited, which rather expresses a preliminary condition of acceptable prayer. The conclusion then begins with בִּי-אֵין, then indeed, like ch. viii. 6, xiii. 19, comp. vi. 3, with בִּי עַתָּה, now indeed; the causal signification of כִּי has in both instances passed into the confirmatory (comp. 1 Sam. xiv. 44, Ps. cxviii. 10–12, cxxviii. 2, and on Gen. xxvi. 22): then verily wilt thou be able to raise thy countenance (without being forced to make any more bitter complaints, as ch. x. 15 sq.), without spot, i.e. not: without bodily infirmity, but: without spot of punishable guilt, sceleris et pænæ (Rosenmüller). מִן here signifies without (Targ. מִלָּא), properly: far from, as ch. xxi. 9, 2 Sam. i. 22, Prov. xx. 3. Faultless will he then be able to look up and be firm (מִצָּק from יָצַק, according to Ges. § 71), quasi ex ære fusus (1 Kings vii. 16), one whom God can no longer get the better of.

- 16 *For thou shalt forget thy grief,
Shalt remember it as waters that have flowed by.*
- 17 *And thy path of life shall be brighter than mid-day;
If it be dark, it shall become as morning.*
- 18 *And thou shalt take courage, for now there is hope;
And thou shalt search, thou shalt lie down in safety.*
- 19 *And thou liest down without any one making thee afraid;
And many shall caress thy cheeks.*
- 20 *But the eyes of the wicked languish,
And refuge vanisheth from them,
And their hope is the breathing forth of the soul.*

The grief that has been surmounted will then leave no trace in the memory, like water that flows by (not: water that flows away, as Olshausen explains it, which would be differently expressed; comp. ch. xx. 28 with 2 Sam. xiv. 14). It is not necessary to change כִּי אֶתָּה into כִּי עָתָה (Hirzel); אֶתָּה, as in ver. 13, strengthens the force of the application of this conclusion of his speech. Life (חַיָּה, from חָלַה to glide away, slip, i.e. pass away unnoticed,¹ as αἰών, both life-time, Ps. xxxix. 6, and the world, Ps. xlix. 2, here in the former sense), at the end of which thou thoughtest thou wert already, and which seemed to thee to run on into dismal darkness, shall be restored to thee (יָקוּם with Munach on the ult. as ch. xxxi. 14, not on the penult.) brighter than noon-day (כִּי, more than, i.e. here: brighter than, as e.g. Mic. vii. 4, more thorny than); and be it ever so dark, it shall become like morning. Such must be the interpretation of הָעֶפֶה. It cannot be a substantive, for it has the accent on the penult.; as a substantive it must have been pointed הָעוֹפֶה (after the form הָעוֹדֶה, הָקוֹמֶה, and the like). It is one of the few examples of the paragogic strengthened voluntative in the third pers., like Ps. xx. 4, Isa. v. 19² (Ges. § 48, 3); the cohortative form of the future is used with or without אִם (vid. on Ps. lxxiii. 16) in hypothetical antecedent clauses (Ges. § 128, 1). Translate therefore: should it become dark (accordingly correctly accented with Rebia mugrasch), from עָנָה, to envelope one's self, to darken (whence עֲפֹתָהּ, ch. x. 22), not: shouldst thou become dark (Schlottm.). The feminine forms are instead of the neuter, like תִּמְטִיר, it rains, Amos iv. 7; הִשְׁכָּה, it becomes dark, Mic. iii. 6 (Ges. § 137, 2).

² In other instances, as תִּרְנֶה, Prov. i. 20, viii. 3, and וְהָעֶנְבָה, Ezek. xxiii. 20, the ah is not the cohortative form, but either paragogic without special meaning or (so that the fut. has a double feminine form) a feminine termination, as is evident in ch. xxii. 21, where the ah is combined with the inflection.

The fut. is followed by perff. consecutiva in ver. 18: And thou shalt take confidence, for there is ground for hope for thee; יֵשׁ, with the force of real and lasting existence. וְהִפְרָתָּ is also perff. consec., and is rightly accented as such. If it were to be interpreted et si erubueris pudore tranquille cubabis, it would require the accent on the penult., since it would be a perff. hypotheticum. But although the seeming antithesis of וְהִפְרָתָּ and לְבַטָּחָה (comp. ch. vi. 20) appears to favour this interpretation, it is nevertheless inadmissible, since it introduces a sadness into the promise: granted that thou shouldst be put to shame at this or that prospect; whereas, if הִפְרָתָּ be taken in the sense of scrutari, as it is used by our poet (ch. iii. 21, xxxix. 29) (not with Böttch., who comp. Eccles. v. 11, in the signification fodere = to labour in the field, in which meaning it is not common), the tone of sadness is removed, and the accentuation is duly observed: and thou shalt search about (i.e. examine the state of thy household, which is expressed by וּפְקַדְתָּ in ch. v. 24), thou shalt lay thyself down in peace (i.e. because thou findest everything in a prosperous condition, and hast no anxiety). This feeling of security against every harm that may befall one's person or property, gained from trust in God, is expressed (ver. 19a) under the figure of the peaceful situation of a herd when removed from danger,—a figure which is borrowed from Lev. xxvi. 6, and is frequently repeated in the prophets (Isa. xvii. 2; Zeph. iii. 13). The promises of Zophar culminate in a future exaltation which shall command reverence and inspire trust: et mulcebunt faciem tuam multi. הִלָּךְ פָּנַי, to approach any one in humble entreaty, generally used in reference to God; less frequently, as here and Ps. xlv. 13, Prov. xix. 6, in reference to men in high positions. The end of the wicked, on the other hand, is told in ver. 20. Zophar here makes use of the choicest expressions of the style of the prophetic psalms: כָּלָה, otherwise frequently used of those who pine away with longing, here and ch. xvii. 5 of eyes that languish with unsatisfied longing; מִנֶּהֱם (Aram. מִנְהֵן), poetic for מָהֶם; מִפֶּשׁ נִפְּחַ, after the phrase נִפְּחַ נֶפֶשׁ, he breathes forth his soul (Jer. xv. 9, comp. Job xxxi. 39). The meaning is not that death is their only hope, but that every expectation remains unfulfilled; giving up the ghost is that whither all their disappointed hopes tend.

That Zophar, in the mind of the poet, is the youngest of the three speakers, may be concluded from his introducing him last of all, although he is the most impetuous. Zophar manifests a still greater inability than the other two to bring Job to a right state of mind. His standpoint is the same as that of the others; like them, he regards the retributive justice of God as the principle on which alone the divine government in the world is exercised, and to which every act of this government is to be attributed, and it may indeed be assumed to be at work even when the relation of circumstances is mysterious and impenetrably dark to us. This limited view which the friends take of the matter readily accounts for the brevity of their speeches in comparison with Job's. This one locus communis is their only theme, which they reiterate constantly in some new and modified form; while the mind of Job is an exhaustless fountain of thought, suggested by the direct experiences of the past. Before the present dispensation of suffering came upon Job, he enjoyed the peace of true godliness, and all his thoughts and feelings were under the control of a consciousness, made certain by his experience, that God makes himself known to those who fear Him. Now, however, his nature, hitherto kept in subjection by divine grace, is let loose in him; the powers of doubt, mistrust, impatience, and despondency have risen up; his inner life is fallen into the anarchy of conflict; his mind, hitherto peaceful and well-disciplined, is become a wild chaotic confusion; and hence his speeches, in comparison with those of the friends, are as roaring cataracts to small confined streams. But in this chaos lie the elements of a new creation; the harsh pertinacity with which the friends maintain their one dogma only tends to give an impulse to it. The new truth, the solution of the mystery, springs from this spiritual battle Job has to fight, from which, although not scathless, he still shall come forth as conqueror.

When, therefore, Zophar regards the speeches of Job, which are the involuntary expression of the severity of his conflict, as a torrent of words, he shows that from the haughty elevation of his narrow dogma he does not understand this form of experience; and when he reproaches Job by saying, Whoever can babble so much shows that he is not in the right, he makes use of a maxim which is true enough in itself, but its application to Job proceeds from the most uncharitable misconstruction of his suffering friend. As he looks upon Job, who, in the midst of his fierce conflict, struggles after comfort, but thrusts away all false consolation, he regards him as a cavilling opponent because he cuts the knot instead of untying it. He is so blinded by the idea that he is in possession of the key to the mystery, that he malignantly reproaches Job with being an incorrigible "empty-pate." As though there could be hollowness where there is a heart that seethes like metal in the refiner's crucible; and as though the dogma of the friends, which forms the sole contents of their hollowness, could possibly impart light and peace to a heart so sorely troubled!

Is the dogma of the friends, then, so pure a doctrine (לֵקֶחַ זָרָה) as that which, according to Zophar's words, Job claims for himself? On Zophar's side it is maintained that God always acts in accordance with justice, and Job maintains that God does not always so act. The maxim of the friends is false in the exclusiveness with which they maintain it; the conclusion to which they are urged gives evidence of the fallacy of the premises: they must condemn Job, and consequently become unjust, in order to rescue the justice of God. Job's maxim, on the other hand, is true; but it is so unconnected as it stands, that it may be turned over any moment and changed into a falsehood. For that God does not act everywhere as the Just One is a truth, but that He sometimes acts unjustly is blasphemy. Between these two Job hangs in suspense. For the steadfast consciousness of his innocence proves to him that God does not always act as the Just One; shall he therefore suppose that God deals unjustly with him? From this blasphemous inversion of his maxim, Job seeks refuge in the absolute power of God, which makes that just which is unjust according to the clearest human consciousness. This is the feeble thread on which Job's piety hangs. Should this be cut, it would be all over with him. The friends do their best to cut it in twain. Zophar's speech is like a sword-thrust at it.

For while Eliphaz and Bildad with cautious gentleness describe suffering more as chastisement than as punishment, Zophar proceeds more boldly, and demands of Job that he should humble himself, as one who has incurred punishment from God. Of sin on Job's part which may have called down the divine judgment, Zophar knows as little as Job himself. But he wishes that God would grant Job some insight into His infinite wisdom, since he refuses to humble himself. Then he would confess his folly, and see that God not only does not punish him unjustly, but even allows much of his guilt to go unpunished. Job is therefore to turn penitently to God, and to put away that evil which is the cause of his suffering, in order that he may be heard. Then shall his hopeless condition become bright with hope; whereas, on the other hand, the downfall of the wicked is beyond recovery. Ewald aptly remarks that thus even the promissory concluding words of the speeches of the friends are always more and more equivocal. "Eliphaz just adds a slight caution, Bildad introduces the contrast in a few words, and Zophar adds but a word; all these seem to be as the forerunners of a multitude of similar harsh threatenings, ch. xv. xviii. xx."

What impression will this harsh treatment of Zophar's produce on Job? Job is to humble himself as a sinner who is undergoing the punishment of his sin, though the measure of it is far below the degree of his guilt; and while he does not deny his sinful weaknesses, he is nevertheless convinced that he is righteous, and having as such experienced the favour of God, cannot become an object of punishment. Brentius discriminatingly observes here: Videntur et Sophar et reliqui amici Hiob prorsus ignorare quid sit aut efficiat Evangelion et fides in promissionem Dei; sic argumentantur contra Hiobem, quasi nullus unquam possit coram Deo fide justificari. The language is rather too much in accordance with the light of the New Testament; but it is true that the friends know nothing whatever of the condition of a truly righteous man, over whom the law with its curse, or the retributive justice of God, has no power. The interpretation of affliction in accordance with the recognition of this principle is strange to them; and this is just the issue which is developed by the drama in the case of Job—the idea which comes to light in the working out of the plot. Even Job does not perceive the solution of the mystery, but, in the midst of the conflict, is in a state of ignorance which excites compassion; the ignorance of the friends arising from their shallowness of understanding, on the contrary, creates aversion. When Zophar, therefore, wishes that God would grant Job some insight into His infinite wisdom, it is indeed true that Job is greatly in need of it; but it is self-deceiving pride which leads Zophar to imagine that he has no need of it himself. For this Wisdom which has decreed the suffering of Job is hidden from him also; and yet he does not treat the suffering of his friend as a divine mystery. He explains it as the working of the retributive justice of God; but since he endeavours thus to explain the mystery, he injures his cause, and if possible injures also the slender thread by which Job's faith hangs. For should Job regard his sufferings as a just divine retribution, he could then no longer believe on God as the Just One.

Job's Third Answer.—Chap. xii.—xiv.

Schema : 5. 8. 8. 6. 6. 10. 8. | 4. 8. 10. 10. 6. 6. 6. 7. | 6. 7. 7. 7. 10. 7. 6.

[Then Job began, and said:]

Ch. xii. 2 Truly then ye are the people,

And wisdom shall die with you!

3 I also have a heart as well as you;

I do not stand behind you;

And to whom should not such things be known?

The admission, which is strengthened by אִמָּנִים בִּי, truly then (distinct from אִמָּנִים בִּי, for truly, ch. xxxvi. 4, similar to הִנֵּה בִּי, behold indeed, Ps. cxxviii. 4), is intended as irony: ye are not merely single individuals, but the people = race of men (עַם, as Isa. xl. 7, xlii. 5), so that all human understanding is confined to you, and there is none other to be found; and when once you die, it will seem to have died out. The LXX. correctly renders: μὴ ὑμεῖς ἐστὲ ἀνθρώποι μόνοι (according to the reading of the Cod. Alex.); he also has a heart like them, he is therefore not empty, נָבוֹב, ch. xi. 12. Heart is, like ch. xxxiv. 10, comp. נֶלֶב, ch. xi. 12, equivalent to νοῦς, διάνοια; Ewald's translation, "I also have a head even as you" ("brains" would better accord with the connection), is a western form of expression, and modern and unbiblical (vid. Division "Heart and Head," Psychol. iv. § 12). He is not second to them; נָפַל מִן, like ch. xiii. 2, properly to slip from, to be below any one; מִן is not the comparative (Ewald). Oetinger's translation is not bad: I cannot slink away at your presence. Who has not a knowledge of such things as those which they, by setting themselves up as defenders of God, have presented to him! יִרְעֵתִי הָיָה אִתִּי is equivalent to σένοιδα, Isa. lix. 12.

- 4 *I must be a mockery to my own friend,
I who called on Eloah and He heard me;
A mockery—the just, the godly man.*
- 5 *Contempt belongs to misfortune, according to the ideas of the prosperous;
It awaits those who are ready to slip.*
- 6 *The tents of the destroyers remain in peace,
And those that defy God are prosperous,
Who taketh Eloah into his hand.*

The synallage of לִרְעֵי for לִרְעֵי is not nearly so difficult as many others: a laughing-stock to his own friend; comp. Isa. ii. 8, they worship the work of their (his) own hands (יָדָיו). "One who called on Eloah (לְאֱלֹהִים), for which לְאֱלֹהִים is found in mss. at ch. xxxvi. 2) and He heard him" is in apposition to the subject; likewise צַדִּיק תָּמִים, which is to be explained according to Prov. xi. 5, צַדִּיק (from צָדַק, صدق, to be hard, firm, stiff, straight), is one who in his conduct rules himself strictly according to the will of God; תָּמִים, one whose thoughts are in all respects and without disguise what they should be, —in one word: pure. Most old translators (Targ., Vulg., Luther) give לִפִּיר the signification, a torch. Thus e.g. Levi b. Gerson explains: "According to the view of the prosperous and carnally secure, he who is ready for falterings of the feet, i.e. likely to fall, is like a lighted torch which burns away and destroys whatever comes in contact with it, and therefore one keeps aloof from him; but it is also more than this: he is an object of contempt in their eyes." Job might not inappropriately say, that in the eyes of the prosperous he is like a despised, cast-away torch (comp. the similar figure, Isa. xiv. 19, like a branch that is rejected with contempt); and ver. 5b would be suitably connected with this if לְמוֹעֲדֵי could be derived from a substantive מֵעַר, vacillatio, but neither the usage of the language nor the scriptio plena (after which Jerome translates tempus statutum, and consequently has in mind the מועדים, times of festal pilgrimages, which are also called רִגְלִים in later times), nor the vowel pointing (instead of which מֵעַרִי would be expected), is favourable to this. מועדי רגל signifies vacillantes pede, those whose prosperity is shaken, and who are in danger of destruction that is near at hand. We therefore, like Abenezra and modern expositors, who are here happily agreed, take לַפִּיר as composed of ל and פִּיר, a word common to the books of Job (ch. xxx. 24, xxxi. 29) and Proverbs (ch. xxiv. 22), which is compared by the Jewish lexicographers, according both to form and meaning, to פִּיר (ch. xxi. 20) and אִיר, and perhaps signifies originally dissolution (comp. פרה), decease (Syr. f'jodo, escape; Arab. faid or fid, dying), fall, then generally calamity, misfortune: contempt (benefits) misfortune, according to the thoughts (or thinking), idea of the prosperous. The pointing wavers between לְעִשְׁתוֹת and the more authorized לְעִשְׁתוֹת, with which Parchon compares the nouns עֲבֻדוֹת and מְרֻדוֹת; the ת, like ד in the latter word, has Dag. lene, since the punctuation is in this respect not quite consistent, or follows laws at present unknown (comp. Ges. § 21, rem. 2). Ver. 5b is now suitably connected: ready (with reference to בּוֹ) for those who stumble, i.e. contempt certainly awaits such, it is ready and waiting for them, נִבֵּן, ἔτοιμος, like Ex. xxxiv. 2.

While the unfortunate, in spite of his innocence, has thus only to expect contempt, the tents, i.e. dwellings and possessions, of the oppressor and the marauder remain in prosperity; יִשְׁלֵי for יִשְׁלֵי, an intensive form used not only in pause (Ps. xxxvi. 8; comp. Deut. xxxii. 37) and with greater distinctives (Num. xxiv. 6; Ps. cxxii. 6), but also in passages where it receives no such accent (Ps. xxxvi. 9, lvii. 2, lxxiii. 2). On אֶהְלִים, instead of אֶהְלִים, vid. Ges. § 93, 6, 3. The verbal clause (ver. 6a) is followed by a substantival clause (6b). בְּטַחוֹת is an abstract plural from בָּטַח, perfectly secure; therefore: the most care-less security is the portion of those who provoke God (LXX. παροργίζουσι);¹ and this is continued in an individualizing form: him who causes Eloah to go into his hand. Seb. Schmid explains this passage in the main correctly: qui Deum in manu fert h.e. qui manum aut potentiam suam pro Deo habet et licitum sibi putat quodlibet; comp. Hab. i. 11: "this his strength becomes God to him," i.e. he deifies his own power, and puts it in the place of God. But הִבִּיא signifies, in this connection with לָרִי (not בִּירו), neither to carry, nor to lead (Gesenius, who compares Ps. lxxiv. 5, where, however, it signifies to cause to go into = to strike into); it must be translated: he who causes Eloah to enter into his hand; from which translation it is clear that not the deification of the hand, but of that which is taken into the hand, is meant. This which is taken into the hand is not, however, an idol (Abenezra), but the sword; therefore: he who thinks after the manner of Lamech,² as he takes the iron weapon of attack and defence into his hand, that he needs no other God.

- 7 *But ask now even the beasts—they shall teach it thee ;
And the birds of heaven—they shall declare it to thee :*
- 8 *Or look thoughtfully to the ground—it shall teach it thee ;
And the fish of the sea shall tell it thee.*
- 9 *Who would not recognise in all this
That the hand of Jehovah hath wrought this,*
- 10 *In whose hand is the soul of every living thing,
And the breath of all mankind ? !*

The meaning of the whole strophe is perverted if וְאַתָּה (ver. 9) is, with Ewald, referred to “the destiny of severe suffering and pain,” and if that which precedes is accordingly referred to the testimony of creation to God as its author. Since, as a glance at what follows shows, Job further on praises God as the governor of the universe, it may be expected that the reference is here to God as the creator and preserver of the world, which seems to be the meaning of the words. Job himself expresses the purpose of this hymn of confession, vers. 2 sq., xiii. 1 sq. : he will show the friends that the majesty of God, before which he ought, according to their demands, to humble himself in penitence, is not less known to him than to them ; and with וְאֵלֶּם, verum enim vero, he passes over to this subject when he begins his third answer with the following thought: The perception in which you pride yourselves I also possess ; true, I am an object of scornful contempt to you, who are as little able to understand the suffering of the godly as the prosperity of the godless, nevertheless what you know I also know : ask now, etc. Bildad had appealed to the sayings of the ancients, which have the long experience of the past in their favour, to support the justice of the divine government ; Job here appeals to the absoluteness of the divine rule over creation. In form, this strophe is the counterpart of ch. viii. 8-10 in the speech of Bildad, and somewhat also of ch. xi.

7-9 in that of Zophar. The working of God, which infinitely transcends human power and knowledge, is the sermon which is continuously preached by all created things; they all proclaim the omnipotence and wisdom of the Creator.

The plural בְּהֵמוֹת is followed by the verb that refers to it, in the singular, in favour of which Gen. xlix. 22 is the favourite example among old expositors (Ges. § 146, 3). On the other hand, the verb might follow the collective עוֹף in the plural, according to Ges. § 146, 1. The plural, however, is used only in ver. 8b, because there the verb precedes instead of following its subject. According to the rule Ges. § 128, 2, the jussive form of the fut. follows the imperative. In the midst of this enumeration of created things, שִׁיחַ, as a substantive, seems to signify the plants—and especially as شَيْح even now, in the neighbourhood of Job's ancient habitation, is the name of a well-known plant of the steppe—under whose shade a meagre vegetation is preserved even in the hot season (vid. on ch. xxx. 4 sqq.). But (1) שִׁיחַ as subst. is gen. masc. (Gen. ii. 5); (2) instead of לְאָרֶץ, in order to describe a plant that is found on the ground, or one rooted in the ground, it must be עַל-הָאָרֶץ or בָּאָרֶץ; (3) the mention of plants between the birds and fishes would be strange. It may therefore be taken as the imperative: speak to the earth (LXX., Targ., Vulg., and most others); or, which I prefer, since the Aramaic construction קָח לוֹ, narravit ei, does not occur elsewhere in Hebrew (although perhaps implicite, Prov. vi. 22, תְּשִׁיחַ לךְ = תְּשִׁיחַ לךְ, fabulabitur, or confabulabitur tibi), as a pregnant expression: think, i.e. look meditatively to the earth (Ewald), since שִׁיחַ (שִׁיחַ), like הִנֵּה, combines the significations of quiet or articulate meditation on a subject. The exhortation directs attention not to the earth in itself, but to the small living things which move about on the ground, comprehended in the collective name רֶמֶשׂ, syn. שֹׁרֵץ (creeping things), in the record of creation. All these creatures, though without reason and speech, still utter a language which is heard by every intelligent man. Renan, after Ewald, translates erroneously: qui ne sait parmi tous ces êtres. They do not even possess knowledge, but they offer instruction, and are a means of knowledge; אֵל with יָדָה, like Gen. xv. 8, xlii. 33, and freq.¹ All the creatures named declare that the hand of Jehovah has made "this," whatever we see around us, τὸ βλεπόμενον, Heb. xi. 3. In the same manner in Isa. lxvi. 2, Jer. xiv. 22, אֵל-אֱלֹהִים is used of the world around us. In the hand of God, i.e. in His power, because His workmanship, are the souls of all living things, and the spirit (that which came direct from God) of all men; every order of life, high and low, owes its origin and continuance to Him. אִישׁ is the individual, and in this connection, in which נַפְשׁ and רוּחַ (= נִשְׁמָה) are certainly not unintentionally thus separated, the individual man. Creation is the school of knowledge, and man is the learner. And this knowledge forces itself upon one's attention: quis non cognoverit? The perf. has this subjunctive force also elsewhere in interrogative clauses, e.g. Ps. xi. 3 (vid. on Gen. xxi. 7). That the name of God, JEHOVAH, for once escapes the poet here, is to be explained from the phrase "the hand of Jehovah hath made this," being a somewhat proverbial expression (comp. Isa. xli. 20, lxvi. 2).

Job now refers to the sayings of the fathers, the authority of which, as being handed down from past generations, Bildad had maintained in his opposition to Job.

- 11 *Shall not the ear try sayings,
As the palate tasteth food?*
- 12 *Among the ancients is wisdom,
And long life is understanding.*
- 13 *With Him is wisdom and strength;

The meaning of ver. 11 is, that the sayings (מִלִּי, ch. viii. 10, comp. v. 27) of the ancients are not to be accepted without being proved; the waw in וְיִי is waw adæquationis, as ch. v. 7, xi. 12, therefore equivalent to quemadmodum; it places together for comparison things that are analogous: The ear, which is used here like αἰσθητήριον (Heb. v. 14), has the task of searching out and testing weighty sayings, as the palate by tasting has to find out delicious and suitable food; this is indicated by יֵל, the dat. commodi. So far Job recognises the authority of these traditional sayings. At any rate, he adds (ver. 12): wisdom is to be expected from the hoary-headed, and length of life is understanding, i.e. it accompanies length of life. "Length of days" may thus be taken as the subject (Ewald, Olsh.); but זֶ may also, with the old translations and expositors, be carried forward from the preceding clause: ἐν δὲ πολλῷ βίῳ ἐπιστήμη (LXX.). We prefer, as the most natural: long life is a school of understanding. But—such is the antithesis in ver. 13 which belongs to this strophe—the highest possessor of wisdom, as of might, is God. Ewald inserts two self-made couplets before ver. 12, which in his opinion are required both by the connection and "the structure of the strophe;" we see as little need for this interpolation here as before, ch. vi. 14b. וְיִי and יֵל, which are placed first for the sake of emphasis, manifestly introduce an antithesis; and it is evident from the antithesis, that the One who is placed in contrast to the many men of experience is God. Wisdom is found among the ancients, although their sayings are not to be always implicitly accepted; but wisdom belongs to God as an attribute of His nature, and indeed absolutely, i.e. on every side, and without measure, as the piling up of synonymous expressions implies: חֲכָמָה, which perceives the reason of the nature, and the reality of the existence, of things; וְעֵצָה, which is never perplexed as to the best way of attaining its purpose; תְּבוּנָה, which can penetrate to the bottom of what is true and false, sound and corrupt (comp. 1 Kings iii. 9); and also גְּבוּרָה, which is able to carry out the plans, purposes, and decisions of this wisdom against all hindrance and opposition.

In the strophe which follows, from his own observation and from traditional knowledge (ch. xiii. 1), Job describes the working of God, as the unsearchably wise and the irresistibly mighty One, both among men and in nature.

- 14 *Behold, He breaketh down and it cannot be built again,
He shutteth up, and it cannot be opened.*
15 *Behold, He restraineth the waters and they dry up,
And He letteth them out and they overturn the earth.*
16 *With Him is might and existence,
The erring and the deceiver are His.*

God is almighty, and everything in opposition to Him powerless. If He break down (any structure whatever), it can never be rebuilt; should He close upon any one (i.e. the dungeon, as perhaps a cistern covered with a stone, Lam. iii. 53, comp. Jer. xxxviii. 6; עֵל with reference to the depth of the dungeon, instead of the usual בָּעֵר), it (that which is closed from above) cannot be opened again. In like manner, when He desires to punish a land, He disposes the elements according to His will and pleasure, by bringing upon it drought or flood. יַעֲצֹר, coercet, according to the correct Masoretic mode of writing יַעֲצֹר with dagesh in the Ssade, in order clearly to distinguish in the pronunciation between the forms j'a-ssor and jaa'ssor (יַעֲצֹר);¹ וַיִּבְשֹׁ (for which Abulwalid writes וַיִּבְשֹׁ) is a defective form of writing according to Ges. § 69, 3, 3; the form וַיִּהְפְּכוּ with the similarly pointed fut. consec., 1 Sam. xxv. 12, form a pair (זֶגֶן) noted by the Masora. By תַּחֲשִׁיחַ, which is ascribed to God, is here to be understood that which really exists, the real, the objective, knowledge resting on an objective actual basis, in contrast with what only appears to be; so that consequently the idea of vers. 16a and 13a is somewhat veiled; for the primary notion of חֲבִימָה is thickness, solidity, purity, like πυκνότης.¹ This strophe closes like the preceding, which favours our division. The line with עִמּוֹ is followed by one with לוֹ, which affirms that, in the supremacy of His rule and the wisdom of His counsels, God makes evil in every form subservient to His designs.

- 17 *He leadeth away counsellors stripped of their robes,
And maketh judges fools.*
- 18 *The authority of kings He looseth,
And bindeth their loins with bands.*
- 19 *He leadeth away priests stripped of their robes,
And overthroweth those who are firmly established.*
- 20 *He removeth the speech of the eloquent,
And taketh away the judgment of the aged.*
- 21 *He poureth contempt upon princes,
And maketh loose the girdle of the mighty.*

In vers. 17, 19, שׁוּלָל is added to מוֹלִיךְ as a conditional accusative; the old expositors vary in the rendering of this word; at any rate it does not mean: chained (Targ. on ver. 17), from שָׁלַל (שרר), which is reduplicated in the word שְׁלִשְׁלָה, a chain, a word used in later Hebrew than the language of the Old Testament (שְׁרִשְׁרָה is the Old Testament word); nor is it: taken as booty, made captive (LXX. αἰχμαλώτους; Targ. on ver. 19, בְּבִיחָא, in the quality of spoil) = מְשׁוּלָל; but it is a neuter adjective closely allied to the idea of the verb, exutus, not however mente (deprived of sense), but vestibus; not merely barefooted (Hirz., Oehler, with LXX., Mic. i. 8, ἀνυπόδετος), which is the meaning of יָחַף, but : stripped of their clothes with violence (vid. Isa. xx. 4), stripped in particular of the insignia of their power. He leads them half-naked into captivity, and takes away the judges as fools (יְהוֹלֵל, vid. Psychol. p. 343), by destroying not only their power, but the prestige of their position also. We find echoes of this utterance respecting God's paradoxical rule in the world in Isa. xl. 23, xlv. 25; and Isaiah's oracle on Egypt, ch. xix. 11-15, furnishes an illustration in the reality.

The primary notion of חֲכִימָה, חֲכִימָה, is, to be thick, firm, solid, as the prim. notion of שֶׁחִיף (to be foolish, silly) is to be thin, loose, not holding together (as a bad texture). The same fundamental notions are represented in the expression of moral qualities (in distinction from intellectual) by רָשָׁע, רָשָׁע, and צַדִּיק, צַדִּיק.

It is but too natural to translate ver. 18 : the bands of kings He looses (after Ps. cxvi. 16, פָּתַחַת לְמוֹסָרִי, Thou hast loosed my bands); but the relation of the two parts of the verse can then not be this: He unchains and chains kings (Hirz., Ew., Heiligst., Schlottm.), for the fut. consec. וַיֵּאָסֶר requires a contrast that is intimately connected with the context, and not of mere outward form : fetters in which kings have bound others (מַלְכִּים, gen. subjectivus) He looses, and binds them in fetters (Raschi),—an explanation which much commends itself, if מוֹסֵר could only be justified as the construct of מוֹסֵר by the remark that “the o sinks into u” (Ewald, § 213, c). מוֹסֵר does not once occur in the signification vinculum; but only the plur. מוֹסָרִים and מוֹסָרוֹת, vincula, accord with the usage of the language, so that even the pointing מוֹסֵר proposed by Hirzel is a venture. מוֹסֵר, however, as constr. of מוֹסֵר, correction, discipline, rule (i.e. as the domination of punishment, from יָסַר, castigare), is an equally suitable sense, and is probably connected by the poet with פָּתַח (a word very familiar to him, ch. xxx. 11, xxxix. 5, xli. 6) on account of its relation both in sound and sense to מוֹסָרִים (comp. Ps. cv. 22). The English translation is correct: He looseth the authority of kings. The antithesis is certainly lost, but the thoughts here moreover flow on in synonymous parallelism.

Ver. 19. It is unnecessary to understand בְּהִנִּיּים, after 2 Sam. viii. 18, of high officers of state, perhaps privy councillors; such priest-princes as Melchizedek of Salem and Jethro of Midian are meant. אֵיתָנִים, which denotes inexhaustible, perennis, when used of waters, is descriptive of nations as invincibly independent, Jer. v. 15, and of persons as firmly-rooted and steadfast. נִאֲמָנִים, such as are tested, who are able to speak and counsel what is right at the fitting season, consequently the ready in speech and counsel. The derivation, proposed by Kimchi, from נָאֵם, in the sense of diserti, would require the pointing נִאֲמָנִים טַעַם. טַעַם is taste, judgment, tact, which knows what is right and appropriate under the different circumstances of life, 1 Sam. xxv. 33. יָקָח is used exactly as in Hos. iv. 11. Ver. 21a is repeated verbatim, Ps. cvii. 40; the trilogy, Ps. cv.-cvii., particularly Ps. cvii., is full of passages similar to the second part of Isaiah and the book of Job (vid. Psalter, ii. 117). אֲפִיקִים (only here and ch. xli. 7) are the strong, from אָפַק, to hold together, especially to concentrate strength on anything. מִזִּיָּה (only here, instead of מִזִּיָּה, not from מִזִּיָּה, which is an imaginary root, but from מִזִּיָּה, according to Fürst equivalent to מִזִּיָּה, to lace, bind) is the girdle with which the garments were fastened and girded up for any great exertion, especially for desperate conflict (Isa. v. 27). To make him weak or relaxed, is the same as to deprive of the ability of vigorous, powerful action. Every word is here appropriately used. This tottering relaxed condition is the very opposite of the intensity and energy which belongs to "the strong." All outward and inward power is subject to God: He gives or takes it away according to His supreme will and pleasure.

- 22 *He discovereth deep things out of darkness,
And bringeth out to light the shadow of death ;*
- 23 *He giveth prosperity to nations and then destroyeth them,
Increase of territory to nations and then carrieth them away ;*
- 24 *He taketh away the understanding of the chief people of the land,
And maketh them to wander in a trackless wilderness ;*
- 25 *They grope in darkness without light,
He maketh them to stagger like a drunken man.*

The meaning of ver. 22 in this connection can only be, that there is nothing so finely spun out that God cannot make it visible. All secret plans of the wicked, all secret sins, and the deeds of the evil-doer though veiled in deep darkness, He bringeth before the tribunal of the world. The form of writing given by the Masora is עֲמוּקוֹת with koph raphatum, consequently plur. from עֲמוּק, like עֲרוּמִים, עֲצוּמִים, from עָרוּם, עָצוּם, not from עֲמֹק.¹ The LXX. translates משניא πλανῶν, as it is also explained in several Midrash-passages, but only by a few Jewish expositors (Jachja, Alschech) by מטעה. The word, however, is not מְשַׁנֵּא, but מְשַׁנֵּא with ש sinistrum, after which in Midrash Esther it is explained by מְגַדֵּל; and Hirzel correctly interprets it of upward growth (Jerome after the Targ. unsuitably, multiplicat), and שֹׁטֵם, on the other hand, of growth in extent. The latter word is falsely explained by the Targ. in the sense of expandere rete, and Abenezra also falsely explains: He scatters nations, and brings them to their original peace. The verb שֹׁטֵם is here connected with לָ, as הִפְתָּה (Gen. ix. 27); both signify to make a wider and longer space for any one, used here of the ground where they dwell and rule. The opposite, in an unpropitious sense, is הִנָּחָה, which is used here, as 2 Kings xviii. 11, in a similar sense with הִנָּלָה (abducere, i.e. in servitutem). We have intentionally translated גוֹיִם nations, עַם people; for גוֹי, as we shall show elsewhere, is the mass held together by the ties of a common origin, language, and country; עַם (עָם), the people bound together by unity of government, whose membra præcipua are consequently called רֵאשֵׁי הָעָם. הָאָרֶץ is, in this connection, the country, although elsewhere, as Isa. xxiv. 4, comp. xlii. 5, עַם הָאָרֶץ signifies also the people of the earth or mankind; for the Hebrew language expresses a country as a portion of the earth, and the earth as a whole, by the same name. Job dwells longer on this tragic picture, how God makes the star of the prosperity of these chiefs to set in mad and blind self-destruction, according to the proverb, quem Deus perdere vult prius dementat. This description seems to be echoed in many points in Isaiah, especially in the oracle on Egypt, ch. xix. (e.g. בְּשִׁבּוֹר, xix. 14). The connection לֹא דֶרֶךְ בָּתְחוּ is not genitival; but לֹא דֶרֶךְ is either an adverbial clause appended to the verb, as לֹא חָקַר, ch. xxxiv. 24, לֹא בָנִים, 1 Chron. ii. 30, 32, or, which we prefer as being more natural, and on account of the position of the words, a virtual adjective: in a trackless waste, as לֹא אִישׁ, ch. xxxviii. 26; לֹא עֲבוֹת, 2 Sam. xxiii. 4 (Olsh.).

Job here takes up the tone of Eliphaz (comp. ch. v. 13 sq.). Intentionally he is made to excel the friends in a recognition of the absolute majesty of God. He is not less cognizant of it than they.

- Ch. xiii. 1 *Lo, mine eye hath seen all,
Mine ear hath heard and marked it.*
2 *What ye know do I know also,
I do not stand back behind you.*

Job has brought forward proof of what he has stated at the commencement of this speech (ch. xii. 3), that he is not inferior to them in the knowledge of God and divine things, and therefore he can now repeat as proved what he maintains. The plain כָּל, which in other passages, with the force of כָּל־הֵם, signifies omnes (Gen. xvi. 12; Isa. xxx. 5; Jer. xlv. 12) and omnia (ch. xlii. 2; Ps. viii. 7; Isa. xlv. 24), has the definite sense of hæc omnia here. אָזְנִי (ver. 1b) is not after the Aramaic manner dat. pro acc. objecti: my ear has heard and comprehended it (id); but dat. commodi, or perhaps only dat. ethicus: and has made it intelligible to itself (sibi); יָדָא of the apprehension accompanying perception. He has a knowledge of the exalted and glorious majesty of God, acquired partly from his own observation and partly from the teachings of others. He also knows equal to (instar) their knowledge, i.e. he has a knowledge (עָרָא as the idea implied in it, e.g. like Ps. lxxxii. 5) which will bear comparison with theirs. But he will no longer contend with them.

- 3 *But I would speak to the Almighty,
And I long to reason with God.*
- 4 And ye however are forgers of lies, Physicians of no value are ye all.
- 5 *Oh that ye would altogether hold your peace,
It would be accounted to you as wisdom.*
- 6 *Hear now my instruction,
And hearken to the answers of my lips!*

He will no longer dispute with the friends; the more they oppose him, the more earnestly he desires to be able to argue his cause before God. וְאִנִּי (ver. 3) is disjunctive, like ἀλλά, and introduces a new range of thoughts; LXX. οὐ μὲν δὲ ἀλλά, verum enim vero. True, he has said in ch. ix. that no one can maintain his cause before God; but his confidence in God grows in proportion as his distrust of the friends increases; and at the same time, the hope is begotten that God will grant him that softening of the terror of His majesty which he has reserved to himself in connection with this declaration (ch. ix. 34, comp. xiii. 20 sq.). The infin. absol. הוֹכִיחַ, which in ch. vi. 25 is used almost as a substantive, and indeed as the subject, is here in the place of the object, as e.g. Isa. v. 5, lviii. 6: to prove, i.e. my cause, to God (אֶל-אֱלֹהִים, like ver. 15, אֶל-פָּנָיו) I long. With וְאֵלֶיךָ (ver. 4) the antithesis is introduced anew: I will turn to God, you on the contrary (καὶ ὑμεῖς δὲ). Since the verb טָפַל, from its primary meaning to spread on, smear on (whence e.g. Talmudic טָפְלָה, the act of throwing on, as when plastering up the cracks of an oven), cogn. תָּפַל (whence תָּפַל, plaster, and perhaps also in the signification tasteless, ch. vi. 6 = sticky, greasy, slimy), does not signify, at least not at first, consuere, but assuere (without any relation of root with תָּפַר), we explain, not with Olshausen and others, concinnaiores mendacii, such as sew together lies as patchwork; but with Hirzel and others, assutores mendacii, such as patch on lies, i.e. charge falsely, since they desire throughout to make him out to be a sinner punished according to his desert. This explanation is also confirmed by ch. xiv. 17. Another explanation is given by Hupfeld: sarcinatores falsi = inanes, inutiles, so that שָׁקַר signifies what lies = what deceives, as in the parallel member of the verse אֵלֵּל,¹ nothingness, and also עָמַל (ch. xvi. 2) in a similar connection, is not an objective but attributive genitive; but Ps. cxix. 69 is decisive against this interpretation of טָפְלֵי שָׁקַר. The parallelism is not so exactly adjusted, as e.g. even רְפָאִי does not on account of the parallel with טָפְלֵי signify patchers, ῥάπται, but: they are not able to heal Job's wounds with the medicine of consolation; they are medici nihili, useless physicians. Prov. xvii. 28, "Even a fool, when he holdeth his peace, is counted wise," applies to them, si tacuisses, sapiens mansisses; or, as a Rabbinical proverb of similar meaning, quoted by Heidenheim, says, הלאות בהשנה השנה, "the fatigue of comprehension is comprehension," i.e. the silent pause before a problem is half the solution. The jussive form וְתָהִי, it would be (Ges. § 128, 2), is used in the conclusion of the wish. Thus he challenges them to hear his תּוֹכַחַת (תּוֹכֶחֶת) and his רְבוֹת. Hirzel is quite right when he says the former does not mean defence (justification), nor the latter proofs (counter-evidence); תּוֹכַחַת is, according to its signification (significatus, in distinction from sensus), ἔλεγχος, correptio (LXX., Vulg.), and here not so much refutation and answer, as correction in an ethical sense, in correspondence with which רְבוֹת is also intended of reproaches, reproofs, or reprimands.

- 7 Will ye speak what is wrong for God,
And speak what is deceitful for Him?
- 8 Will ye be partial for Him,
Or will ye play the part of God's advocates?
- 9 Would it be pleasant if He should search you out,
Or can ye jest with Him, as one jesteth with men?
- 10 He will surely expose you
If ye secretly act with partiality.
- 11 Will not His majesty confound you,
And His fear fall upon you?

Their advocacy of God—this is the thought of this strophe—is an injustice to Job, and an evil service rendered to God, which cannot escape undisguised punishment from Him. They set themselves up as God's advocates (רִיב לְאֵל, like רִיב לְבַעַל, Judg. vi. 31), and at the same time accept His person, acipiunt (as in acceptus = gratus), or lift it up, i.e.

favour, or give preference to, His person, viz. at the expense of the truth: they are partial in His favour, as they are twice reminded and given to understand by the fut. energicum הִשָּׁאֵן. The addition of בִּפְתֹּר (ver. 10b) implies that they conceal their better knowledge by the assumption of an earnest tone and bearing, expressive of the strongest conviction that they are in the right. They know that Job is not a flagrant sinner; nevertheless they deceive themselves with the idea that he is, and by reason of this delusion they take up the cause of God against him. Such perversion of the truth in majorem Dei gloriam is an abomination to God. When He searches them, His advocates, out (רָחַק, as Prov. xxviii. 11), they will become conscious of it; or will God be mocked, as one mocketh mortal men? Comp. Gal. vi. 7 for a similar thought. הִתֵּל is inf. absol. after the form הִסֵּב, and הִתְהַלֵּךְ is also to be derived from הִלֵּךְ, and is fut. Hiph., the preformative not being syncopated, for הִתְהַלֵּךְ (Gen. § 53, rem. 7); not Piel, from הִתֵּל (as 1 Kings xviii. 27), with the doubling of the middle radical resolved (Olsh. in his Lehrb. S. 577). God is not pleased with λατρεία (John xvi. 2) which gives the honour to Him, but not to truth, such ζῆλος Θεοῦ ἀλλ' οὐ κατ' ἐπίγνωσιν (Rom. x. 2), such advocacy contrary to one's better knowledge and conscience, in which the end is thought to sanctify the means. Such advocacy must be put to shame and confounded when He who needs no concealment of the truth for His justification is manifest in His שִׁאֵת, i.e. not: in the kindling of His wrath (after Judg. xx. 38, Isa. xxx. 27), but: in His exaltation (correctly by Ralbag: הַתְנַשְׁאוֹת וְרוֹמְמוֹתוֹ), and by His direct influence brings all untruth to light. It is the boldest thought imaginable, that one dare not have respect even to the person of God when one is obliged to lie to one's self. And still it is also self-evident. For God and truth can never be antagonistic.

- 12 *Your memorable words are proverbs of dust,
Your strongholds are become strongholds of clay !*
- 13 *Leave me in peace, and I will speak,
And let what will come on me.*
- 14 *Wherefore should I bear my flesh in my teeth ?—
No, indeed ! I take my soul in my hands.*
- 15 *Behold, He slayeth me—I wait for Him :
I will only prove my way before Him.*
- 16 *Even this would be my salvation,
That a hypocrite dare not appear before Him.*

The words by which they exhort and warn him are called זְכָרִים, not because they recall the experience and teaching of the ancients (Hirz.), but as sayings to which attention and thought should be given, with the tone of זְכָרָנָא, ch. iv. 7 (Hahn) ; as סֵפֶר זִכְרוֹן, Mal. iii. 16, the book of remembrance ; and סֵפֶר זִכְרוֹנוֹת, Esth. vi. 1, the book of memorabilia or memoranda. These their loci communes are proverbs of ashes, i.e. proverbs which, in respect to the present case, say nothing, passing away like ashes (אִפֶּר = vanity, Isa. xlv. 20). While ver. 12*a* says what their speeches, with the weighty nota bene, are, ver. 12*b* says what their נִפְיִים become ; for לְ always denotes a κίνησις = γένεσις, and is never the exponent of the predicate in a simple clause.¹ Like the Arabic ظَهْر, signifies a boss, back, then protection, bulwark, rampart : their arguments or proofs are called נִבִּים (עֲצָמוֹת, Isa. xli. 21 ; comp. ὀχυρώματα, 2 Cor. x. 4) ; these ramparts which they throw up become as ramparts of clay, will be shown to be such by their being soon broken through and falling in.

¹ The Jewish expositors compare 1 Chron. iii. 2 on לְנִבִּי, but the ל there in לְאֲבִשְׁלוֹם is a clerical error (comp. 2 Sam. iii. 3). Reiske conjectures רִנְבִּי (lumps of clay), one of the best among his most venturesome conjectures.

Their reasons will not stand before God, but, like clay that will not hold together, fall to pieces.

Ver. 13. Be silent therefore from me, he says to them, i.e. stand away from me and leave me in peace (opp. החריש אל, Isa. xli. 1): then will I speak, or: in order that I may speak (the cohortative usual in apod. imper.)—he, and he alone, will defend (i.e. against God) his cause, which they have so uncharitably abandoned in spite of their better knowledge and conscience, let thereby happen (עבר, similar to Deut. xxiv. 5) to him מָה, whatever may happen (מָה שיעבר); or more simply: whatever it may be, quidquid est, as 2 Sam. xviii. 22 ויהי מָה, let happen whatever may happen; or more simply: whatever it may be, like מָה דְּבַר quodcunque, Num. xxiii. 3; מִי occurs also in a similar sense, thus placed last (Ewald, § 104, d).

Ver. 14. Wherefore should he carry away his flesh in his teeth, i.e. be intent upon the maintenance of his life, as a wild beast upon the preservation of its prey, by holding it between its teeth (mordicus tenet) and carrying it away? This is a proverbial phrase which does not occur elsewhere; for Jer. xxxviii. 2 (thy life shall become as spoil, לְשָׁלָל, to thee) is only similar in outward appearance. It may be asked whether ver. 14b continues the question begun with עַל-מָה (vid. on Isa. i. 5): and wherefore should I take my soul in my hands, i.e. carefully protect it as a valuable possession? (Eichh., Umbr., Vaih.) But apart from Ps. cxix. 109 (my soul is continually in my hand),—where it may be asked, whether the soul is not there regarded as treasure (according to the current religious phrase: to carry his soul in his hand = to work out the blessedness of his soul with fear and trembling),—נִפְשִׁי נִפְשִׁי כְּבָפִי signifies everywhere else (Judg. xii. 3; 1 Sam. xix. 5, xxviii. 21) as much as to risk one's life without fear of death, properly speaking: to fight one's way through with one's fist, perishing so soon as the strength of one's fist is gone (Ewald);

comp the expression for the impending danger of death, Deut. xxviii. 66. If this sense, which is in accordance with the usage of the language, be adopted, it is unnecessary with Hirz., after Ewald, § 352, b, to take וְנַפְשִׁי for נַפְשִׁי : also, even my soul, etc., although it cannot be denied that וְ, like καί and et, sometimes signifies : also, etiam (Isa. xxxii. 7, 2 Chron. xxvii. 5, Eccles. v. 6, and according to the accents, Hos. viii. 6 also; on the contrary, 2 Sam. i. 23, Ps. xxxi. 12, can at least be explained by the copulative meaning, and Amos iv. 10 by “and indeed”). The waw joins the positive to the negative assertion contained in the question of ver. 14*a* (Hahn): I will not eagerly make my flesh safe, and will take my soul in my hand, i.e. calmly and bravely expose myself to the danger of death. Thus ver. 15 is most directly connected with what precedes.

Ver. 15. This is one of 18, or rather 15, passages in which the Chethib is נָל and the Keri וְ; ch. vi. 21 is another.¹ In the LXX., which moreover changes וְאִתָּל into וְאִתָּל, ἀρχεσθαι, the rendering is doubtful, the Cod. Vat. translating εἰάν με χειρώσεται, the Cod. Alex. εἰάν μή με χειρ. The Mishna b. Sota, 27, b, refers to the passage with reference to the question whether Job had served God from love or fear, and in favour of the former appeals to ch. xxvii. 5, since here the matter is doubtful (הֲדָבָר יִשְׁקוּל), as the present passage may be explained, "I hope in Him," or "I hope not." The Gemara, ib. 31, a, observes that the reading לֹא does not determine the sense, for Isa. lxiii. 9 is written לֹא, and is not necessarily to be understood as לוֹ, but can be so understood.¹ Among the ancient versions, the Targ., Syr., and Jerome (etiamsi occiderit me, in ipso sperabo) are in favour of לוֹ. This translation of the Vulgate is followed by the French, English, Italian, and other versions. This utterance, in this interpretation, has a venerable history. The Electoress Louise Henriette von Oranien (died 1667), the authoress of the immortal hymn, "Jesus meine Zuversicht" [the English translation begins, "Jesus Christ, my sure defence"], chose these words, "Though the Lord should slay me, yet will I hope in Him," for the text of her funeral oration. And many in the hour of death have adopted the utterance of Job in this form as the expression of their faith and consolation.² Among these we may mention a Jewess. The last movement of the wasted fingers of Grace Aguilar was to spell the words, "Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him."³

The words, so understood, have an historic claim in their favour which we will not dispute. Even the apostles do not spurn the use of the Greek words of the Old Testament, though they do not accord with the proper connection in the original text, provided they are in accordance with sacred Scripture, and give brief and pregnant expression to a truth taught elsewhere in the Scriptures. Thus it is with this utterance, which, understood as the Vulgate understands it, is thoroughly Job-like, and in some measure the final solution of the book of Job. It is also, according to its most evident meaning, an expression of perfect resignation. We admit that if it is translated : behold, He will slay me, I hope not, i.e. I await no other and happier issue, a thought is obtained that also agrees with the context. But יָחַל does not properly mean to hope, but to wait for ; and even in ch. vi. 11, xiv. 14, where it stands as much without an object as here, it has no other meaning but that of waiting ; and Luther is true to it when he translates : behold, He will destroy me, and I cannot expect it ; it is, however, strange ; and Böttch. translates : I will not wait to justify myself, which is odd. The proper meaning of יָחַל, præstolari, gives no suitable sense. Thus, therefore, the writer will have written or meant לֹא, since לֹא יָחַל is also elsewhere a familiar expression with him, ch. xxix. 21, 23, xxx. 26. The meaning, then, which agrees both with the context and with the reality, is : behold, He will slay me, I wait for Him, i.e. I wait what He may do, even to smite with death, only I will (וְאֵלֵּי, as frequently, e.g. Ps. xlix. 16, does not belong to the word which immediately follows, but to the whole clause) prove my ways to Him, even before His face. He fears the extreme, but is also prepared for it. Hirzel, Heiligst., Vaihinger, and others, think that Job regards his wish for the appearing of God as the certain way of death, according to the belief that no one can behold God and not die. But יִקְטְלֵנִי has reference to a different form of idea. He fears the risk of disputing with God, and being obliged to forfeit his life ; but, as לֹא אֵיחָל implies, he resigns himself even to the worst, he waits for Him to whom he resigns himself, whatever He may do to him ; nevertheless (וְאֵלֵּי restrictive, or as frequently וְאֵלֵּי, adversative, which is the same thing here) he cannot and will not keep down the inward testimony of his innocence, he is prepared to render Him an account of the ways in which he has walked (i.e. the way of His will)—he can succumb in all respects but that of his moral guiltlessness. And in ver. 16 he adds what will prove a triumph for him, that a godless person, or (what is suitable, and if it does not correspond to the primary idea,¹ still accords with the use of the word) a hypocrite, one who is condemned as such by his own heart, would not so come forward to answer for himself before God (Hahn). It can be explained: that a godless person has no access to God; but the other explanation gives a truer thought. הוּא is here used as neuter, like ch. xv. 9, xxxi. 28 comp. 11, xli. 3, Ex. xxxiv. 10. Correctly LXX., καὶ τοῦτό μοι ἀποβήσεται εἰς σωτηρίαν. יְשׁוּעָה here (comp. ch. xxx. 15) has not, however, the usual deeper meaning which it has in the prophets and in Psalms. It means here salvation, as victory in a contest for the right. Job means that he has already as good as won the contest, by so urgently desiring to defend himself before God. This excites a feeling in favour of his innocence at the onset, and secures him an acquittal.

- 17 *Hear, O hear my confession,
And let my declaration echo in your ears.*
18 *Behold now! I have arranged the cause,
I know that I shall maintain the right.*
19 *Who then can contend with me?
Then, indeed, I would be silent and expire.*

Eager for the accomplishment of his wish that he might himself take his cause before God, and as though in imagination it were so, he invites the friends to be present to hear his defence of himself. מִלָּה (in Arabic directly used for confession = religion) is the confession which he will lay down, and אֶחָדָה the declaration that he will make in evidence, i.e. the proof of his innocence. The latter substantive, which signifies brotherly conduct in post-biblical Hebrew, is here a ἀπ. λεγ. from אָחָד, not however with Aleph prostheticum from Kal, but after the form אֶחָדָה = הֶזְכָּרָה, from the Aphél = Hiphil of this verb, which, except Ps. xix. 3, occurs only in the book of Job as Hebrew (comp. the n. actionis, אֶחָדָה, Dan. v. 12), Ewald, § 156, c. It is unnecessary to carry the שְׁמָעִי on to ver. 17b (hear now . . . with your own ears, as e.g. Jer. xxvi. 11); ver. 17b is an independent substantival clause like ch. xv. 11, Isa. v. 9, which carries in itself the verbal idea of אָחָדָה or אֶחָדָה (Ps. xviii. 7). They shall hear, for on his part he has arranged, i.e. prepared (עָרַף מִשְׁפָּט, causam instruere, as ch. xxiii. 4, comp. xxxiii. 5) the cause, so that the action can begin forthwith; and he knows that he, he and no one else, will be found in the right. With the conviction of this superiority, he exclaims, Who in all the world could contend with him, i.e. advance valid arguments against his defence of himself? Then, indeed, if this impossibility should happen, he would be dumb, and willingly die as one completely overpowered not merely in outward appearance, but in reality vanquished. מִי הוּא יִרְיֶב עִמָּדִי following מִי הוּא (comp. ch. iv. 7) may be taken as an elliptical relative clause: qui litigare possit mecum (comp. Isa. l. 9 with Rom. viii. 34, τίς ὁ κατακρίνων); but since מִי הוּא is also used in the sense of quis tandem or ecquisnam, this syntactic connection which certainly did exist (Ewald, § 325, a) is obliterated, and הוּא serves like זֶה only to give intensity and vividness to the מִי. On בִּי עָתָה (in meaning not different to אֵי), vid. ch. iii. 13, viii. 6. In ver. 19 that is granted as possible which, according to the declaration of his conscience, Job must consider as absolutely impossible. Therefore he clings to the desire of being able to bring his cause before God, and becomes more and more absorbed in the thought.

- 20 *Only two things do not unto me,
Then will I not hide myself from Thy countenance :*
21 *Withdraw Thy hand from me,
And let Thy fear not terrify me—*
22 *Call then and I will answer,
Or I will speak and answer Thou me !*

He makes only two conditions in his prayer, as he has already expressed it in ch. ix. 34 : (1) That God would grant him a cessation of his troubles ; (2) That He would not overwhelm him with His majesty. The chastening hand of God is generally called יָד elsewhere ; but in spite of this prevalent usage of the language, יָד cannot be understood here (comp. on the contrary ch. xxxiii. 7) otherwise than of the hand (ch. ix. 34 : the rod) of God, which lies heavily on Job. The painful pressure of that hand would prevent the collecting and ordering of his thoughts required for meeting with God, and the אִימָה (Codd. defectively אִמָּה) of God would completely crush and confound him. But if God grants these two things : to remove His hand for a time, and not to turn the terrible side of His majesty to him, then he is ready whether God should himself open the cause or permit him to have the first word. Correctly Mercerus : optionem ei dat ut aut actoris aut rei personam deligat, sua fretus innocentia, sed interim sui oblitus et immodicus. In contrast with God he feels himself to be a poor worm, but his consciousness of innocence makes him a Titan.

He now says what he would ask God ; or rather, he now asks Him, since he vividly pictures to himself the action with God which he desires. His imagination anticipates the reality of that which is longed for. Modern expositors begin a new division at ver. 23. But Job's speech does not yet take a new turn ; it goes on further continually uno tenore.

23 How many are mine iniquities and sins ?

Make me to know my transgression and sin !— —

24 Wherefore dost Thou hide Thy face,

And regard me as Thine enemy ?

25 Wilt Thou frighten away a leaf driven to and fro,

And pursue the dry stubble ?

When עָוֹן and חַטָּאת, פֶּשַׁע and חַטָּאת, are used in close connection, the latter, which describes sin as failing and error, signifies sins of weakness (infirmities, Schwachheitssünde) ; whereas עָוֹן (prop. distorting or bending) signifies misdeed, and פֶּשַׁע (prop. breaking loose, or away from, Arab. فسق) wickedness which designedly estranges itself from God and removes from favour, both therefore malignant sin (*Bosheits-sünde*¹). The bold self-confidence which is expressed in the question and challenge of ver. 23 is, in ver. 24, changed to grievous astonishment that God does not appear to him, and on the contrary continues to pursue him as an enemy without investigating his cause. Has the Almighty then pleasure in scaring away a leaf that is already blown to and fro ? הִעָלָה, with He interrog., like הִחָכַם, ch. xv. 2, according to Ges. § 100, 4. עָרַץ used as transitive here, like Ps. x. 18, to terrify, scare away affrighted. Does it give Him satisfaction to pursue dried-up stubble ? By אֶחָד (before an indeterminate noun, according to Ges. § 117, 2) he points δεικτικῶς to himself : he, the powerless one, completely deprived of strength by sickness and pain, is as dried-up stubble ; nevertheless God is after him, as though He would get rid of every trace of a dangerous enemy by summoning His utmost strength against him.

- 26 *For Thou decreest bitter things against me,
And causest me to possess the iniquities of my youth,*
27 *And puttest my feet in the stocks,
And observest all my ways.*
Thou makest for thyself a circle round the soles of my feet, 28 *Round one who moulders away as worm-eaten,
As a garment that the moth gnaweth.*

He is conscious of having often prayed: "Remember not the sins of my youth, and my transgressions: according to Thy mercy remember Thou me," Ps. xxv. 7; and still he can only regard his affliction as the inheritance (i.e. entailed upon him by sins not repented of) of the sins of his youth, since he has no sins of his mature years that would incur wrath, to reproach himself with. He does not know how to reconcile with the justice of God the fact that He again records against him sins, the forgiveness of which he implores soon after their commission, and decrees (בָּתֵּב, as Ps. cxlix. 9, and as used elsewhere in the book of Job with reference to the recording of judgment) for him on account of them such bitter punishment (מְרִירוֹת, amara, bitter calamities; comp. Deut. xxxii. 32, "bitter" grapes). And the two could not indeed be harmonized, if it really were thus. So long as a man remains an object of the divine mercy, his sins that have been once forgiven are no more the object of divine judgment. But Job can understand his affliction only as an additional punishment. The conflict of temptation through which he is passing has made God's loving-kindness obscure to him. He appears to himself to be like a prisoner whose feet are forced into the holes of a סֵר, i.e. the block or log of wood in which the feet of a criminal are fastened, and which he must shuffle about with him when he moves; perhaps connected with ^וסד, occludere, opplere (foramen), elsewhere מִהֶפְכֶּת (from the forcible twisting or fastening), Chald. סְרִיָּא, סְרִנָּא, Syr. sado, by which Acts xvi. 24, ξύλον = ποδοκάκη, is rendered; Lat. cippus (which Ralbag compares), codex (in Plautus an instrument of punishment for slaves), or also nervus. The verb מְשִׁים which belongs to it, and is found also in ch. xxxiii. 11 in the same connection, is of the jussive form, but is neither jussive nor optative in meaning, as also the future with shortened vowel (e.g. ch. xxvii. 22, xl. 19) or apocopated (ch. xviii. 12, xxiii. 9, 11) is used elsewhere from the preference of poetry for a short pregnant form. He seems to himself like a criminal whose steps are closely watched (שָׁמֵר, as ch. x. 14), in order that he may not have the undeserved enjoyment of freedom, and may not avoid the execution for which he is reserved by effecting an escape by flight. Instead of אֶרְחֹתַי, the reading adopted by Ben-Ascher, Ben-Naphtali writes אֶרְחֹתַי, with Cholem in the first syllable; both modes of punctuation change without any fixed law also in other respects in the inflexion of אֶרַח, as of אֶרְחָה, a caravan, the construct is both אֶרְחֹת, ch. vi. 19, and אֶרְחֹת. It is scarcely necessary to remark that the verbs in ver. 27bc are addressed to God, and are not intended as the third pers. fem. in reference to the stocks (Ralbag). The roots of the feet are undoubtedly their undermost parts, therefore the soles. But what is the meaning of תִּתְחַקֶּה? The Vulg., Syr., and Parchon explain: Thou fixest thine attention upon . . . , but certainly according to mere conjecture; Ewald, by the help of the Arabic tahhakkaka ala: Thou securest thyself . . . , but there is not the least necessity to depart from the ordinary use of the word, as those also do who explain: Thou makest a law or boundary (Aben-Ezra, Ges., Hahn, Schlottm.). The verb חָקַה is the usual word (certainly cognate and interchangeable with חָקַק) for carved-out work (intaglio), and perhaps with colour rubbed in, or filled up with metal (vid. ch. xix. 23, comp. Ezek. xxiii. 14); it signifies to hew into, to carve, to dig a trench. Stickel is in some measure true to this meaning when he explains: Thou scratchest, pressest (producing blood); by which rendering, however, the Hithpa. is not duly recognised. Raschi is better, tu t'affiches, according to which Mercerus: velut affixus vestigiis pedum meorum adhæres, ne quâ elabi possim aut effugere. But a closer connection with the ordinary use of the word is possible. Accordingly Rosenm., Umbreit, and others render: Thou markest a line round my feet (drawest a circle round); Hirz., however, in the strictest sense of the Hithpa.: Thou intrenchest thyself (layest thyself as a circular line about my feet). But the Hithpa. does not necessarily mean se insculpere, but, as התפשט sibi exuere, התפתח sibi solvere, התחנן sibi propitium facere, it may also mean sibi insculpere, which does not give so strange a representation: Thou makest to thyself furrows (or also: lines) round the soles of my feet, so that they cannot move beyond the narrow boundaries marked out by thee. With וְהָיָה, ver. 28, a circumstantial clause begins: While he whom Thou thus fastenest in as a criminal, etc. Observe the fine rhythmical accentuation achālo 'asch. Since God whom he calls upon does not appear, Job's defiance is changed to timidity. The elegiac tone, into which his bold tone has passed, is continued in ch. xiv.

- Ch. xiv. 1 Man that is born of a woman,
 Short of days and full of unrest,
 2 Cometh forth as a flower and is cut down ;
 He fleeth as a shadow, and continueth not.
 3 Moreover, Thou openest Thine eye upon him,
 And Thou drawest me before Thy tribunal.

Even if he yields to the restraint which his suffering imposes on him, to regard himself as a sinner undergoing punishment, he is not able to satisfy himself by thus persuading himself to this view of God's conduct towards him. How can God pass so strict a judgment on man, whose life is so short and full of sorrow, and which cannot possibly be pure from sin?—Ver. 1. אָדָם is followed by three clauses in apposition, or rather two, for יְלִיד אִשָּׁה (LXX. γεννητὸς γυναικός, as Matt. xi. 11; comp. γέννημα γυν. Sir. x. 18) belongs to the subject as an adjectival clause: woman-born man, short-lived, and full of unrest, opens out as a flower. Woman is weak, with pain she brings forth children; she is impure during her lying-in, therefore weakness, suffering, and impurity is the portion of man even from the birth (ch. xv. 14, xxv. 4). As קָצַר is the constr. of קָצַר, so שִׁבַּע (רָגַן) is from שִׁבַּע, which here, as ch. x. 15, has the strong signification: endowed (with adversity). It is questionable whether וַיִּמָּל, ver. 2, signifies et marcescit or et succiditur. We have decided here as elsewhere (vid. on Ps. xxxvii. 2, xc. 6, Genesis, S. 383) in favour of the latter meaning, and as the Targ. (אֶתְמוּלֵּל), translated “he is mown down.” For this meaning (prop. to cut off from above or before, to lop off),—in which the verb מָלַל (מָלַל, מָלַל) is become technical for the περιτομή,—is most probably favoured by its application in ch. xxiv. 24; where Jerome however translates, sicut summities spicarum conterentur, since he derives יָמַל from מָלַל in the signification not found in the Bible (unless perhaps retained in מְלִילָה, Deut. xxiii. 26), fricare (Arab. مَلَّ, frigère, to parch). At the same time, the signification marcescere, which certainly cannot be combined with præcidere, but may be with fricare (conterere), is not unnatural; it is more appropriate to a flower (comp. נָבַל צִיץ, Isa. xl. 7); it accords with the parallelism Ps. xxxvii. 2, and must be considered etymologically possible in comparison with אֶתְמוּלֵּל, קֶתְמוּלֵּל. But it is not supported by any dialect, and none of the old translations furnish any certain evidence in its favour; יִמּוֹלֵל, Ps. xc. 6, which is to be understood impersonally rather than intransitively, does not favour it; and none of the passages in which יָמַל occurs demand it: least of all ch. xxiv. 24, where præciduntur is more suitable than, and ch. xviii. 16, præciditur, quite as suitable as, marcescit. For these reasons we also take יָמַל here, not as fut. Kal from מָלַל, or, as Hahn, from נָמַל = נָבַל, to wither, but as fut. Niph. from מָלַל, to cut down. At the same time, we do not deny the possibility of the notion of withering having been connected with יָמַל, whether it be that it belonged originally and independently to the root מָל, or has branched off from some other radical notion, as “to fall in pieces” (LXX. here ἐξέπεσεν, and similarly also ch. xviii. 16, xxiv. 24; comp. מָלַחַיִם, rags, נִמְלַח, to come to pieces, to be dissolved) or “to become soft” (with which the significations in the dialects, to grind and to parch, may be connected). As a flower, which having opened out is soon cut or withered, is man: אֵהָ, accedit quod, insuper. This particle, related to ἐπί, adds an enhancing cumulat. More than this, God keeps His eye open (not: His eyes, for the correct reading, expressly noted by the Masora, is עֵינָהּ without Jod plur.), עַל־זֶה, super hoc s. tali, over this poor child of man, who is a perishable flower, and not a “walking light, but a fleeting shadow” (Gregory the Great), to watch for and punish his sins, and brings Job to judgment before himself, His tribunal which puts down every justification. Elsewhere the word is pointed בְּמִשְׁפַּט, ch. ix. 32, xxii. 4; here it is בְּמִשְׁפַּט, because the idea is rendered determinate by the addition of עֵמֶךְ.

4 Would that a pure one could come from an impure!

Not a single one—

5 His days then are determined,

The number of his months is known to Thee, Thou hast appointed bounds for him that he may not pass over :

6 *Look away from him then, and let him rest,
Until he shall accomplish as a hireling his day.*

Would that perfect sinlessness were possible to man ; but since (to use a New Testament expression) that which is born of the flesh is flesh, there is not a single one pure. The optative מִיִּיָּתֵן seems to be used here with an acc. of the object, according to its literal meaning, quis det s. afferat, as ch. xxxi. 31, Deut. xxviii. 67, Ps. xiv. 7. Ewald remarks (and refers to § 358, b, of his Grammar) that לֹא, ver. 4*b*, must be the same as לֹא ; but although in 1 Sam. xx. 14, 2 Sam. xiii. 26, 2 Kings v. 17, לֹא might be equivalent to the optative לֹא, which is questionable, still לֹא אָחֵר here, as an echo of אֵין גַּם־אָחֵר, Ps. xiv. 3, is Job's own answer to his wish, that cannot be fulfilled : not one, i.e. is in existence. Like the friends, he acknowledges an hereditary proneness to sin ; but this proneness to sin affords him no satisfactory explanation of so unmerciful a visitation of punishment as his seems to him to be. It appears to him that man must the rather be an object of divine forbearance and compassion, since absolute purity is impossible to him. If, as is really the case, man's days are חֲרוּצִים, cut off, i.e. ἀποτόμῳ, determined (distinct from חֲרוּצִים with an unchangeable Kametz : sharp, i.e. quick, eager, diligent),—if the number of his months is with God, i.e. known by God, because fixed beforehand by Him,—if He has set fixed bounds (Keri חֲקָי) for him, and he cannot go beyond them, may God then look away from him, i.e. turn from him His strict watch (שָׂעָה מִן, as ch. vii. 19 ; נִשִּׁית מִן, x. 20), that he may have rest (יָחַדֵּל, cesset), so that he may at least as a hireling enjoy his day. Thus יָרַח is interpreted by all modern expositors, and most of them consider the object or reason of his rejoicing to be the rest of evening when his work is done, and thereby miss the meaning.

Hahn appropriately says, "He desires that God would grant man the comparative rest of the hireling, who must toil in sorrow and eat his bread in the sweat of his brow, but still is free from any special suffering, by not laying extraordinary affliction on him in addition to the common infirmities beneath which he sighs. Since the context treats of freedom from special suffering in life, not of the hope of being set free from it, comp. ch. xiii. 25–27, xiv. 3, the explanation of Umbreit, Ew., Hirz., and others, is to be entirely rejected, viz. that God would at least permit man the rest of a hireling, who, though he be vexed with heavy toil, cheerfully reconciles himself to it in prospect of the reward he hopes to obtain at evening time. Job does not claim for man the toil which the hireling gladly undergoes in expectation of complete rest, but the toil of the hireling, which seems to him to be rest in comparison with the possibility of having still greater toil to undergo." Such is the true connection.¹ Man's life—this life which is as a handbreadth (Ps. xxxix. 6), and in ch. vii. 1 sq. is compared to a hireling's day, which is sorrowful enough—is not to be overburdened with still more and extraordinary suffering.

It must be asked, however, whether רצה seq. acc. here signifies εὐδοκεῖν (τὸν βίον, LXX.), or not rather persolvere; for it is undeniable that it has this meaning in Lev. xxvi. 34 (vid. however Keil [Pent. ii. 476]) and elsewhere (prop. to satisfy, remove, discharge what is due). The Hiphil is used in this sense in post-biblical Hebrew, and most Jewish expositors explain רצה by ישלים. If it signifies to enjoy, ער ought to be interpreted: that (he at least may, like as a hireling, enjoy his day). But this signification of ut (in the final sense) is strange, and the signification dum (ch. i. 18, viii. 21) or adeo ut (Isa. xlvii. 7) is not, however, suitable, if יִצְחָה is to be explained in the sense of persolvere, and therefore translate donec persolvat (persolverit). We have translated "until he accomplish," and wish "accomplish" to be understood in the sense of "making complete," as Col. i. 24, Luther ("vollzählig machen") = ἀνταναπληροῦν.

7 For there is hope for a tree :

*If it is hewn down, it sprouts again,
And its shoot ceaseth not.*

8 *If its root becometh old in the ground,
And its trunk dieth off in the dust :*

9 *At the scent of water it buddeth,
And bringeth forth branches like a young plant.*

As the tree falleth so it lieth, says a cheerless proverb. Job, a true child of his age, has a still sadder conception of the destiny of man in death ; and the conflict through which he is passing makes this sad conception still sadder than it otherwise is. The fate of the tree is far from being so hopeless as that of man ; for (1) if a tree is hewn down, it (the stump left in the ground) puts forth new shoots (on הִחְלִיף, vid. on Ps. xc. 6), and young branches (יִנְקָה, the tender juicy sucker μόσχος) do not cease. This is a fact, which is used by Isaiah (ch. vi.) as an emblem of a fundamental law in operation in the history of Israel : the terebinth and oak there symbolize Israel ; the stump (מִצְבֵּת) is the remnant that survives the judgment, and this remnant becomes the seed from which a new sanctified Israel springs up after the old is destroyed. Carey is certainly not wrong when he remarks that Job thinks specially of the palm (the date), which is propagated by such suckers ; Shaw's expression corresponds exactly to לֹא תִחְדָּל : “when the old trunk dies, there is never wanting one or other of these offsprings to succeed it.” Then (2) if the root of a tree becomes old (תִּקְיָן inchoative Hiphil: senescere, Ew. § 122, c) in the earth, and its trunk (נֶטֶע also of the stem of an undecayed tree, Isa. xl. 24) dies away in the dust, it can nevertheless regain its vitality which had succumbed to the weakness of old age: revived by the scent (רִיחַ always of scent, which anything exhales, not, perhaps Cant. i. 3 only excepted, odor = odoratus) of water, it puts forth buds for both leaves and flowers, and brings forth branches (קִצְרִי, prop. cuttings, twigs) again, כִּמוֹ נֶטֶע, like a plant, or a young plant (the form of נֶטֶע in pause), therefore, as if fresh planted, LXX. ὥσπερ νεόφυτον. One is here at once reminded of the palm which, on the one hand, is pre-eminently a φιλυδρον φυτόν,¹ on the other hand possesses a wonderful vitality, whence it is become a figure for youthful vigour. The palm and the phoenix have one name, and not without reason. The tree reviving as from the dead at the scent of water, which Job describes, is like that wondrous bird rising again from its own ashes (vid. on ch. xxix. 18). Even when centuries have at last destroyed the palm—says Masius, in his beautiful and thoughtful studies of nature—thousands of inextricable fibres of parasites cling about the stem, and delude the traveller with an appearance of life.

10 But man dieth, he lieth there stretched out, Man giveth up the ghost, and where is he?

11 *The waters flow away from the sea,
And a stream decayeth and dryeth up:*

¹ When the English army landed in Egypt in 1801, Sir Sydney Smith gave the troops the sure sign, that wherever date-trees grew there must be water; and this is supported by the fact of people digging after it generally, within a certain range round the tree within which the roots of the tree could obtain moisture from the fluid.—Vid. R. Wilson's History of the Expedition to Egypt, p. 18.

12 *So man lieth down and riseth not again ;
Till the heavens pass away they wake not,
And are not aroused from their sleep.*

How much less favoured is the final lot of man ! He dies, and then lies there completely broken down and melted away (חָלַשׁ, in the neuter signification, confectum esse, rendered in the Targum by אֶתְבַּר and אֶתְמַקֵּם). The fut. consec. continues the description of the cheerless results of death : He who has thus once fallen together is gone without leaving a trace of life. In vers. 11 sq. this vanishing away without hope and beyond recovery is contemplated under the figure of running water, or of water that is dried up and never returns again to its channel. Instead of אָזַל Isaiah uses נִשְׁתַּח (ch. xix. 5) in the oracle on Egypt, a prophecy in which many passages borrowed from the book of Job are interwoven. The former means to flow away (related radically with נָזַל), the latter to dry up (transposed נִפַּשׁ, Jer. xviii. 14). But he also uses יֶחֱרַב, which signifies the drying in, and then יִיבֶשׁ, which is the complete drying up which follows upon the drying in (vid. Genesis, S. 264). What is thus figuratively expressed is introduced by waw (ver. 12a), similar to the waw adæquationis of the emblematic proverbs mentioned at ch. v. 7, xi. 12 : so there is for man no rising (קוּם), no waking up (הִקְיִי), no ἐγείρεσθαι (נִעוֹר), and indeed not for ever ; for what does not happen until the heavens are no more (comp. Ps. lxxii. 7, till the moon is no more), never happens ; because God has called the heavens and the stars with their laws into existence, לָעַד לְעוֹלָם (Ps. cxlviii. 6), they never cease (Jer. xxxi. 35 sq.), the days of heaven are eternal (Ps. lxxxix. 30). This is not opposed to declarations like Ps. cii. 27, for the world's history, according to the teaching of Scripture, closes with a change in all these, but not their annihilation. What is affirmed in vers. 10-12b of mankind in general, is, by the change to the plural in ver. 12c; affirmed of each individual of the race. Their sleep of death is שָׁנָה עוֹלָם (Jer. li. 39, 57). What Sheôl summons away from the world, the world never sees again. Oh that it were otherwise! How would the brighter future have comforted him with respect to the sorrowful present and the dark night of the grave!

- 13 *Oh that Thou wouldst hide me in Sheôl,
That Thou wouldst conceal me till Thine anger change,
That Thou wouldst appoint me a time and then remember me!*
- 14 *If man dieth, shall he live again?
All the days of my warfare would I wait,
Until my change should come.*
- 15 *Thou wouldst call and I would answer,
Thou wouldst have a desire for the work of Thy hands—*
- 16 *For now thou numberest my steps,
And dost not restrain thyself over my sins.*

The optative וְיִּיחַדְנִי introduces a wish that has reference to the future, and is therefore, as at ch. vi. 8, followed by futt.; comp. on the other hand, ch. xxiii. 3, utinam noverim. The language of the wish reminds one of such passages in the Psalms as xxxi. 21, xxvii. 5 (comp. Isa. xxvi. 20): "In the day of trouble He hideth me in His pavilion, and in the secret of His tabernacle doth He conceal me." So Job wishes that Hades, into which the wrath of God now precipitates him for ever, may only be a temporary place of safety for him, until the wrath of God turn away (שָׁנָה, comp. the causative, ch. ix. 13); that God would appoint to him, when there, a פֶּתַח, i.e. a terminus ad quem (comp. ver. 5), and when this limit should be reached, again remember him in mercy. This is a wish that Job marks out for himself. The reality is indeed different: "if (ἐάν) a man dies, will he live again?" The answer which Job's consciousness, ignorant of anything better, alone can give, is : No, there is no life after death. It is, however, none the less a craving of his heart that gives rise to the wish ; it is the most favourable thought, —a desirable possibility,—which, if it were but a reality, would comfort him under all present suffering : “all the days of my warfare would I wait until my change came.” אֶחָד is the name he gives to the whole of this toilsome and sorrowful interval between the present and the wished-for goal,—the life on earth, which he likens to the service of the soldier or of the hireling (ch. vii. 1), and which is subject to an inevitable destiny (ch. v. 7) of manifold suffering, together with the night of Hades, where this life is continued in its most shadowy and dismal phase. And הַלְיָפָהּ does not here signify destruction in the sense of death, as the Jewish expositors, by comparing Isa. ii. 18 and Cant. ii. 11, explain it ; but (with reference to צִבְאִי, comp. ch. x. 17) the following after (Arab. خليفة, succession, successor, i.e. of Mohammed), relief, change (syn. תַּמְרָה, exchange, barter), here of change of condition, as Ps. lv. 20, of change of mind ; Aquila, Theod., ἀλλαγμα. Oh that such a change awaited him ! What a blessed future would it be if it should come to pass ! Then would God call to him in the depth of Sheôl, and he, imprisoned until the appointed time of release, would answer Him from the deep. After His anger was spent, God would again yearn after the work of His hands (comp. ch. x. 3), the natural loving relation between the Creator and His creature would again prevail, and it would become manifest that wrath is only a waning power (Isa. liv. 8), and love His true and essential attribute. Schlottman well observes : “Job must have had a keen perception of the profound relation between the creature and his Maker in the past, to be able to give utterance to such an imaginative expectation respecting the future.”

In ver. 16, Job supports what is cheering in this prospect, with which he wishes he might be allowed to console himself, by the contrast of the present. כִּי עַתָּה is used here as in ch. vi. 21; כִּי is not, as elsewhere, where כִּי עַתָּה introduces the conclusion, confirmatory (indeed now = then indeed), but assigns a reason (for now). Now God numbers his steps (ch. xiii. 27), watching him as a criminal, and does not restrain himself over his sin. Most modern expositors (Ew., Hlgt., Hahn, Schlottm.) translate: Thou observest not my sins, i.e. whether they are to be so severely punished or not; but this is poor. Raschi: Thou waitest not over my sins, i.e. to punish them; instead of which Ralbag directly: Thou waitest not for my sins = repentance or punishment; but שָׁמַר is not supported in the meaning: to wait, by Gen. xxxvii. 11. Aben-Ezra: Thou lookest not except on my sins, by supplying רָא, according to Eccles. ii. 24 (where, however, probably מְשַׁאֲבֵל should be read, and מַ after אָדָם, just as in ch. xxxiii. 17, has fallen away). The most doubtful is, with Hirzel, to take the sentence as interrogative, in opposition to the parallelism: and dost Thou not keep watch over my sins? It seems to me that the sense intended must be derived from the phrase שָׁמַר אֵף, which means to keep anger, and consequently to delay the manifestation of it (Amos i. 11). This phrase is here so applied, that we obtain the sense: Thou keepest not Thy wrath to thyself, but pourest it out entirely. Mercerus is substantially correct: non reservas nec differs peccati mei punishmentem.

- 17 *My transgression is sealed up in a bag,
And Thou hast devised additions to my iniquity.*
- 18 *But a falling mountain moveth indeed,
And a rock falleth from its place.*
- 19 *Water holloweth out stone,
Its overflowings carry away the dust of the earth,
And the hope of man—Thou destroyest.*

The meaning of ver. 17 is, not that the judgment which pronounces him guilty lies in the sealed-up bag of the judge, so that it requires only to be handed over for execution (Hirz., Ew., Renan), for although עֲשֵׂה (though not exactly the punishment of sin, which it does not signify even in Dan. ix. 24) can denote wickedness, as proved and recorded, and therefore metonymically the penal sentence, the figure is, however, taken not from the mode of preserving important documents, but from the mode of preserving collected articles of value in a sealed bag. The passage must be explained according to Hos. xiii. 12, Deut. xxxii. 34, Rom. ii. 5, comp. Jer. xvii. 1. The evil Job had formerly (ch. xiii. 26) committed according to the sentence of God, God has gathered together as in a money bag, and carefully preserved, in order now to bring them home to him. And not this alone, however; He has devised still more against him than his actual misdeeds. Ewald translates: Thou hast sewed up my punishment; but טָפַל (vid. on ch. xiii. 4) signifies, not to sew up, but: to sew on, patch on, and gen. to add (לְטַפֵּל , Rabb. accidens, a subordinate matter, opp. עֲקָר), after which the LXX. translates $\epsilon\pi\epsilon\sigma\eta\mu\acute{\eta}\nu\omega$ (noted in addition), and Gecatilia حفست (added to in collecting). It is used here just as in the Aramaic phrase טָפַל שְׁקָרָא (to patch on falsehood, to invent scandal).

The idea of the figures which follow is questionable. Hahn maintains that they do not describe destruction, but change, and that consequently the relation of ver. 19c to what precedes is not similarity, but contrast: stones are not so hard, that they are not at length hollowed out, and the firm land is not so firm that it cannot be carried away by the flood; but man's prospect is for ever a hopeless one, and only for him is there no prospect of his lot ever being changed. Thus I thought formerly it should be explained: considering the waw, ver. 19c, as indicative not of comparison, but of contrast. But the assumption that the point of comparison is change, not destruction, cannot be maintained: the figures represent the slow but inevitable destruction wrought by the elements on the greatest mountains, on rocks, and on the solid earth. And if the poet had intended to contrast the slow but certain changes of nature with the hopelessness of man's lot, how many more appropriate illustrations, in which nature seems to come forth as with new life from the dead, were at his command! Raschi, who also considers the relation of the clauses to be antithetical, is guided by the right perception when he interprets: even a mountain that is cast down still brings forth fruit, and a rock removed from its place, even these are not without some signs of vitality in them, $\text{יבול} = (\text{יבול}) \text{יעשה בול}$, which is indeed a linguistic impossibility. The majority of expositors are therefore right when they take the waw, ver. 19c, similarly to ch. v. 7, xi. 12, xii. 11, as waw adaequationis. With this interpretation also, the connection of the clause with what precedes by ואולם (which is used exactly as in ch. i. 11, xi. 5, xii. 7, where it signifies verum enim vero or attamen) is unconstrained. The course of thought is as follows: With unsparing severity, and even beyond the measure of my guilt, hast Thou caused me to suffer punishment for my sins, but (nevertheless) Thou shouldst rather be gentle and forbearing towards me, since even that which is firmest, strongest, and most durable cannot withstand ultimate destruction; and entirely in accordance with the same law, weak, frail man (אָנִישׁ) meets an early certain end, and at the same time Thou cuttest off from him every ground of hope of a continued existence. The waw, ver. 19c, is consequently, according to the sense, more quanto magis than sic, placing the things to be contrasted over against each other. הַר־נוֹפֵל is a falling, not a fallen (Rabag) mountain; and having once received the impetus, it continues gradually to give way; Renan: s'effondre peu à peu. Carey, better: "will decay," for נָבֵל (cogn. נָפַל) signifies, decrease by external loss; specially of the falling off of leaves, Isa. xxxiv. 4. The second figure, like ch. xviii. 4, is to be explained according to ch. ix. 5: a rock removes (not as Jerome translates, transfertur, which would be יַעֲתֶק, and also not as LXX. παλαιωθείσεται, Schlottm.: becomes old and crumbles away, although in itself admissible both as to language and fact; comp. on ch. xxi. 7) from its place; it does not stand absolutely, immoveably fast. In the third figure נִבְנִים is a prominent object, as the accentuation with Mehupach legarmeh or (as it is found in correct Codd.) with Asla legarmeh rightly indicates. שָׁחַק signifies exactly the same as سَحَقَ, atterere, conterere. In the fourth figure, סָפִיחַ must not be interpreted as meaning that which grows up spontaneously without re-sowing, although the Targum translates accordingly: it (the water) washes away its (i.e. the dust of the earth's) after-growth (פְּתָחָא), which Symm. follows (τὰ παραλελειμμένα). It is also impossible according to the expression; for it must have been עֵפֶר הָאָרֶץ. Jerome is essentially correct: et alluvione paulatim terra consumitur. It is true that סָפַח in Hebrew does not mean effundere in any other passage (on this point, vid. on Hab. ii. 15), but here the meaning effusio or alluvio may be supposed without much hesitation; and in a book whose language is so closely connected with the Arabic, we may even refer to סָפַח = سَفَحَ (kindred to سَفَكَ, שָׁפַךְ), although the word may also (as Ralbag suggests), by comparison with מְטַר סָחָף, Prov. xxviii. 3, and سَحَابَةٌ, a storm of rain, be regarded as transposed from סָחִיפִיחַ, from סָחַף in Arab. to tear off, sweep away, Targ. to thrust away (= דָּחַף), Syr., Talm. to overthrow, subvertere (whence s'chifto, a cancer or cancerous ulcer). The suffix refers to מִים, and תִּשְׁטֹף before a plural subject is quite according to rule, Ges. § 146, 3. סָפִיחַ is mostly marked with Mercha, but according to our interpretation Dechî, which is found here and there in the Codd., would be more correct.

The point of the four illustrations is not that not one of them is restored to its former condition (Oetinger, Hirz.), but that in spite of their stability they are overwhelmed by destruction, and that irrecoverably. Even the most durable things cannot defy decay, and now even as to mortal man—Thou hast brought his hope utterly to nought (האֲבִדָהּ with Pathach in pause as frequently; vid. Psalter ii. 468). The perf. is prægnans: all at once, suddenly—death, the germ of which he carries in him even from his birth, is to him an end without one ray of hope,—it is also the death of his hope.

20 *Thou seizest him for ever, then he passeth away;
Thou changest his countenance and castest him forth.*

21 *If his sons come to honour, he knoweth it not;
Or to want, he observeth them not.*

22 *Only on his own account his flesh suffereth pain,
And on his own account is his soul conscious of grief.*

The old expositors thought that תִּתְקַפֶּה must be explained by חִתְקָה מִמֶּנּוּ (Thou provest thyself stronger than he, according to Ges. § 121, 4), because תִּתְקַף is intrans.; but it is also transitive in the sense of seizing forcibly and grasping, ch. xv. 24, Eccles. iv. 12, as Talm. תִּתְקַף (otherwise commonly אֲתִתְקַף as החזיק), Arab. تَقَفَ, comprehendere. The many sufferings which God inflicts on him in the course of his life are not meant; לֹא־נִצָּח does not signify here: continually, without intermission, as most expositors explain, but as ch. iv. 20, xx. 7, and throughout the book: for ever (Rosenm., Hahn, Welte). God gives him the death-stroke which puts an end to his life for ever, he passes away βαίvet, οἴχεται (comp. ch. x. 21); disfiguring his countenance, i.e. in the struggle of death and in death by the gradual working of decay, distorting and making him unlike himself, He thrusts him out of this life (נִשְׁלַח like Gen. iii. 23). The waw consec. is used here as e.g. Ps. cxviii. 27.

When he is descended into Hades he knows nothing more of the fortune of his children, for as Eccles. ix. 6 says: the dead have absolutely no portion in anything that happens under the sun. In ver. 21 Job does not think of his own children that have died, nor his grandchildren (Ewald); he speaks of mankind in general. כָּבֵד and צָעַר are not here placed in contrast in the sense of much and little, but, as in Jer. xxx. 19, in the wider sense of an important or a destitute position; כָּבֵד, to be honoured, to attain to honour, as Isa. lxvi. 5. בִּין (to observe anything) is joined with לְ of the object, as in Ps. lxxiii. 17 (on the other hand, הִלֵּךְ, ch. xiii. 1, was taken as dat. ethicus). He neither knows nor cares anything about the welfare of those who survive him: "Nothing but pain and sadness is the existence of the dead; and the pain of his own flesh, the sadness of his own soul, alone engage him. He has therefore no room for rejoicing, nor does the joyous or sorrowful estate of others, though his nearest ones, affect him" (Hofmann, Schriftbeweis, i. 495). This is certainly, as Ewald and Psychol. p. 521, the meaning of ver. 22; but עָלָיו is hardly to be translated with Hofmann "in him," so that it gives the intensive force of ἰδιος to the suff. For it is improbable that in this connection,—where the indifference of the deceased respecting others, and the absolute reference to himself of the existence of pain on his own account, are contrasted,—עָלָיו, ver. 22*b*, is to be understood according to ch. xxx. 16 (Psychol. p. 180), but rather objectively (over him). On the other hand, ver. 22*a* is not to be translated: over himself only does his flesh feel pain (Schlottm., Hirz., and others); for the flesh as inanimate may indeed be poetically, so to speak zeugmatically, represented as conscious of pain, but not as referring its pain to another, and consequently as self-conscious. On this account, עָלָיו, ver. 22a, is to be taken in the signification, over him = upon him, or as ver. 22b (beyond him), which is doubtful; or it signifies, as we have sought to render it in our translation in both cases, propter eum. Only on his own account does his flesh suffer, i.e. only applying to himself, only on his own account does his soul mourn, i.e. only over his own condition. He has no knowledge and interest that extends beyond himself; only he himself is the object of that which takes place with his flesh in the grave, and of that on which his soul reflects below in the depths of Hades. According to this interpretation עָלָיו belongs to עָלָיו, after the hyperbaton described at p. 72 [ch. ii. 10], comp. ch. xiii. 15, Isa. xxxiv. 15. And the עָלָיו, ver. 22, implies the idea (which is clearly expressed in Isa. lxvi. 24, and especially in Judith xvi. 17: δοῦναι πῦρ καὶ σκώληκας εἰς σάρκας αὐτῶν καὶ κλαύσονται ἐν αἰσθήσει ἕως αἰῶνος) that the process of the decomposition of the body is a source of pain and sorrow to the departed spirit,—a conception which proceeds from the supposition, right in itself, that a connection between body and soul is still continued beyond the grave,—a connection which is assumed by the resurrection, but which, as Job viewed it, only made the future still more sorrowful.

This speech of Job (ch. xii.–xiv.), which closes here, falls into three parts, which correspond to the divisions into chapters. In the impassioned speech of Zophar, who treats Job as an empty and conceited babblers, the one-sided dogmatical standpoint of the friends was maintained with such arrogance and assumption, that Job is obliged to put forth all his power in self-defence. The first part of the speech (ch. xii.) triumphantly puts down this arrogance and assumption. Job replies that the wisdom, of which they profess to be the only possessors, is nothing remarkable, and the contempt with which they treat him is the common lot of the suffering innocent, while the prosperity of the ungodly remains undisturbed. In order, however, to prove to them that what they say of the majesty of God, before which he should humble himself, can neither overawe nor help him, he refers them to creation, which in its varied works testifies to this majesty, this creative power of God, and the absolute dependence of every living thing on Him, and proves that he is not wanting in an appreciation of the truth contained in the sayings of the ancients by a description of the absolute majesty of God as it is manifested in the works of nature, and especially in the history of man, which excels everything that the three had said. This description is, however, throughout a gloomy picture of disasters which God brings about in the world, corresponding to the gloomy condition of mind in which Job is, and the disaster which is come upon himself.

As the friends have failed to solace him by their descriptions of God, so his own description is also utterly devoid of comfort. For the wisdom of God, of which he speaks, is not the wisdom that orders the world in which one can confide, and in which one has the surety of seeing every mystery of life sooner or later gloriously solved; but this wisdom is something purely negative, and repulsive rather than attractive, it is abstract exaltation over all created wisdom, whence it follows that he puts to shame the wisdom of the wise. Of the justice of God he does not speak at all, for in the narrow idea of the friends he cannot recognise its control; and of the love of God he speaks as little as the friends, for as the sight of the divine love is removed from them by the one-sidedness of their dogma, so is it from him by the feeling of the wrath of God which at present has possession of his whole being. Hegel has called the religion of the Old Testament the religion of sublimity (die Religion der Erhabenheit) and it is true that, so long as that manifestation of love, the incarnation of the Godhead, was not yet realized, God must have relatively transcended the religious consciousness. From the book of Job, however, this view can be brought back to its right limits; for, according to the tendency of the book, neither the idea of God presented by the friends nor by Job is the pure undimmed notion of God that belongs to the Old Testament. The friends conceive of God as the absolute One, who acts only according to justice; Job conceives of Him as the absolute One, who acts according to the arbitrariness of His absolute power. According to the idea of the book, the former is dogmatic one-sidedness, the latter the conception of one passing through temptation. The God of the Old Testament consequently rules neither according to justice alone, nor according to a "sublime whim."

After having proved his superiority over the friends in perception of the majesty of God, Job tells them his decision, that he shall turn away from them. The sermon they address to him is to no purpose, and in fact produces an effect the reverse of that intended by them. And while it does Job no good, it injures them, because their very defence of the honour of God incriminates themselves in the eyes of God. Their aim is missed by them, for the thought of the absolute majesty of God has no power to impart comfort to any kind of sufferer; nor can the thought of His absolute justice give any solace to a sufferer who is conscious that he suffers innocently. By their confidence that Job's affliction is a decree of the justice of God, they certainly seem to defend the honour of God; but this defence is reversed as soon as it is manifest that there exists no such just ground for inflicting punishment on him. Job's self-consciousness, however, which cannot be shaken, gives no testimony to its justice; their advocacy of God is therefore an injustice to Job, and a miserable attempt at doing God service, which cannot escape the undisguised punishment of God. It is to be carefully noted that in ch. xiii. 6-12 Job seriously warns the friends that God will punish them for their partiality, i.e. that they have endeavoured to defend Him at the expense of truth.

We see from this how sound Job's idea of God is, so far as it is not affected by the change which seems, according to the light which his temptation casts upon his affliction, to have taken place in his personal relationship to God. While above, ch. ix., he did not acknowledge an objective right, and the rather evaded the thought, of God's dealing unjustly towards him, by the desperate assertion that what God does is in every case right because God does it, he here recognises an objective truth, which cannot be denied, even in favour of God, and the denial of which, even though it were a pientissima fraus, is strictly punished by God. God is the God of truth, and will therefore be neither defended nor honoured by any perverting of the truth. By such pious lies the friends involve themselves in guilt, since in opposition to their better knowledge they regard Job as unrighteous, and blind themselves to the incongruities of daily experience and the justice of God. Job will therefore have nothing more to do with them; and to whom does he now turn? Repelled by men, he feels all the more strongly drawn to God. He desires to carry his cause before God. He certainly considers God to be his enemy, but, like David, he thinks it is better to fall into the hands of God than into the hands of man (2 Sam. xxiv. 14). He will plead his cause with God, and prove to Him his innocence: he will do it, even though he be obliged to expiate his boldness with his life; for he knows that morally he will not be overcome in the contest. He requires compliance with but two conditions: that God would grant a temporary alleviation of his pain, and that He would not overawe him with the display of His majesty. Job's disputing with God is as terrible as it is pitiable. It is terrible, because he uplifts himself, Titan-like, against God; and pitiable, because the God against which he fights is not the God he has known, but a God that he is unable to recognise, —the phantom which the temptation has presented before his dim vision instead of the true God. This phantom is still the real God to him, but in other respects in no way differing from the inexorable ruling fate of the Greek tragedy. As in this the hero of the drama seeks to maintain his personal freedom against the mysterious power that is crushing him with an iron arm, so Job, even at the risk of sudden destruction, maintains the steadfast conviction of his innocence, in opposition to a God who has devoted him, as an evil-doer, to slow but certain destruction. It is the same battle of freedom against necessity as in the Greek tragedy. Accordingly one is obliged to regard it as an error, arising from simple ignorance, when it has been recently maintained that the boundless oriental imagination is not equal to such a truly exalted task as that of representing in art and poetry the power of the human spirit, and the maintenance of its dignity in the conflict with hostile powers, because a task that can only be accomplished by an imagination formed with a perception of the importance of recognising ascertained phenomena.¹ In treating this subject, the book of Job not only attains to, but rises far above, the height attained by the Greek tragedy: for, on the one hand, it brings this conflict before us in all the fearful earnestness of a death-struggle; on the other, however, it does not leave us to the cheerless delusion that an absolute caprice moulds human destiny. This tragic conflict with the divine necessity is but the middle, not the beginning nor the end, of the book; for this god of fate is not the real God, but a delusion of Job's temptation. Human freedom does not succumb, but it comes forth from the battle, which is a refining fire to it, as conqueror. The dualism, which the Greek tragedy leaves unexplained, is here cleared up. The book certainly presents much which, from its tragic character, suggests this idea of destiny, but it is not its final aim—it goes far beyond: it does not end in the destruction of its hero by fate; but the end is the destruction of the idea of this fate itself.

We have seen in this speech (comp. ch. xiii. 23, 26, xiv. 16 sq.), as often already, that Job is as little able as the friends to disconnect suffering from the idea of the punishment of sin. If Job were mistaken or were misled by the friends respecting his innocence, the history of his sufferings would be no material for a drama, because there would be no inner development. But it is just Job's steadfast conviction of his innocence, and his maintenance of it in spite of the power which this prejudice exercises over him, that makes the history of his affliction the history of the development of a new and grand idea, and makes him as the subject, on whom it is developed, a tragic character. In conformity with his prepossession, Job sees himself put down by his affliction as a great sinner; and his friends actually draw the conclusion from false premises that he is such. But he asserts the testimony of his conscience to his innocence; and because this contradicts those premises, the one-sidedness of which he does not discern, God himself appears to him to be unjust and unmerciful. And against this God, whom the temptation has distorted and transformed to the miserable image of a ruler, guided only by an absolute caprice, he struggles on, and places the truth and freedom of his moral self-consciousness over against the restraint of the condemnatory sentence, which seems to be pronounced over him in the suffering he has to endure. Such is the struggle against God in which we behold Job in the second part of the speech (ch. xiii.): ready to prove his innocence, he challenges God to trial; but since God does not appear, his confidence gives place to despondency, and his defiant tone to a tone of lamentation, which is continued in the third part of the speech (ch. xiv.).

While he has raised his head towards heaven with the conscious pride of a צַדִּיק תָּמִים, first in opposition to the friends and then to God, he begins to complain as one who is thrust back, and yielding to the pressure of his affliction, begins to regard himself as a sinner. But he is still unable to satisfy himself respecting God's dealings by any such forcible self-persuasion. For how can God execute such strict judgment upon man, whose life is so short and full of care, and who, because he belongs to a sinful race, cannot possibly be pure from sin, without allowing him the comparative rest of a hireling? How can he thus harshly visit man, to whose life He has set an appointed bound, and who, when he once dies, returns to life no more for ever? The old expositors cannot at all understand this absolute denial of a new life after death. Brentius erroneously observes on donec cælum transierit: ergo resurget; and Mercerus, whose exposition is free from all prejudice, cannot persuade himself that the electus et sanctus Dei vir can have denied not merely a second earthly life, but also the eternal imperishable life after death. And yet it is so: Job does not indeed mean that man when he dies is annihilated, but he knows of no other life after death but the shadowy life in Sheôl, which is no life at all. His laments really harmonize with those in Moschos iii. 106 sqq.:

Αἰ αἰ, ταὶ μαλάχαι μὲν ἐπ' ἂν κατὰ κᾶπον ὄλωνται,
 * Ἡ τὰ χλωρὰ σέλινα, τό τ' εὐθαλὲς οὖλον ἄνηθον,
 " Ὅστερον αὖ ζῶντι καὶ εἰς ἔτος ἄλλο φύοντι
 * Ἀμμες δ' οἱ μεγάλοι καὶ καρτεροὶ ἢ σοφοὶ ἄνδρες,
 ' Ὅπποτε πρῶτα θάνωμες, ἀνάκοι ἐν χθονὶ κοίλα
 Εὐδομες εὖ μάλα μακρὸν ἀτέρμονα νήγρετον ὕπνον.

Alas! alas! the mallows, after they are withered in the garden,
 Or the green parsley and the luxuriant curly dill,
 Live again hereafter and sprout in future years;
 But we men, the great and brave, or the wise,
 When once we die, senseless in the bosom of the earth
 We sleep a long, endless, and eternal sleep.

And with that of Horace, Od. iv. 7, 1:

*Nos ubi decidimus
 Quo pius Aeneas, quo dives Tullus et Ancus, Pulvis et umbra sumus;*

Or with that of the Jagur Weda: "While the tree that has fallen sprouts again from the root fresher than before, from what root does mortal man spring forth when he has fallen by the hand of death?"¹ These laments echo through the ancient world from one end to the other, and even Job is without any superior knowledge respecting the future life.

¹ Vid. Carey, The Book of Job, p. 447. We append here an extract from a letter of Consul Wetzstein, as giving an explanation of Job xiv. 7-9, derived from personal observation: "The practice of cutting down the trees in order to obtain a new and increased use from them, is an important part of husbandry in the country east of the Jordan. It is, however, now almost confined to the region round Damascus, in consequence of the devastation of the country. This operation is called gemm (גִּמָּם), and is performed only with the axe, because the stump would decay away if sawn. When the vine, after bearing from sixty to eighty years, loses its fruitfulness and begins to decay, it is cut down close to the ground in the second kânûn (January). The first year it bears little or nothing, but throws out new branches and roots; and afterwards it bears plentifully, for the vine-stock has renewed its youth. The fig-tree (tîne) and the pomegranate (rummâne), when old and decayed, are cut down in like manner. Their shoots are very numerous, and in the following winter as many as ten young plants may be taken from the pomegranate. Those that are left on the old stem bear fruit in the fourth year. The walnut-tree (gôze) ceases to bear much after 100 years, and becomes hollow and decayed. It is then cut down to within two or three yards from the ground. If the trees are well watered, the new shoots spring up in a year in uncommon luxuriance, and bear fruit in the second year. The new shoot is called darbûne. From many trees, as the citron (îmûne), ash (dardâre), and mulberry (tûte), this new shoot often attains a length of twelve feet in the first year, provided the tree has the conditio sine qua non which Job styles רִיחַ מַיִם—a plentiful supply of water."

He denies a resurrection and eternal life, not as one who has a knowledge of them and will not however know anything about them, but he really knows nothing of them: our earthly life seems to him to flow on into the darkness of Sheôl, and onward beyond Sheôl man has no further existence.

We inquire here: Can we say that the poet knew nothing of a resurrection and judgment after death? If we look to the psalms of the time of David and Solomon, we must reply in the negative. Since, however, as the Grecian mysteries fostered and cherished ἡδυστέρας ἐλπίδας, the Israelitish Chokma also, by its constant struggles upwards and onwards, anticipated views of the future which exceeded the knowledge then possessed (Psychol. p. 480): it may be assumed, and from the book of Job directly inferred, that the poet had a perception of the future world which went beyond the dim perception of the people, which was not yet lighted up by any revelation. For, on the one hand, he has reproduced for us a history of the patriarchal period, not merely according to its external, but also according to its internal working, with as strict historical faithfulness as delicate psychological tact; on the other, he has with a master hand described for us in the history of Job what was only possible from an advanced standpoint of knowledge,—how the hope of a life beyond the present, where there is no express word of promise to guide it, struggles forth from the heart of man as an undefined desire and longing, so that the word of promise is the fulfilment and seal of this desire and yearning. For when Job gives expression to the wish that God would hide him in Sheôl until His anger turn, and then, at an appointed time, yearning after the work of His hands, raise him again from Sheôl (ch. xiv. 13–17), this wish is not to be understood other than that Sheôl might be only his temporary hiding-place from the divine anger, instead of being his eternal abode.

He wishes himself in Sheôl, so far as he would thereby be removed for a time from the wrath of God, in order that, after an appointed season, he might again become an object of the divine favour. He cheers himself with the delightful thought, All the days of my warfare would I wait till my change should come, etc.; for then the warfare of suffering would become easy to him, because favour, after wrath and deliverance from suffering and death, would be near at hand. We cannot say that Job here expresses the hope of a life after death; on the contrary, this hope is wanting to him, and all knowledge respecting the reasons that might warrant it. The hope exists only in imagination, as Ewald rightly observes, without becoming a certainty, since it is only the idea, How glorious it would be if it were so, that is followed up. But, on the one side, the poet shows us by this touching utterance of Job how totally different would be his endurance of suffering if he but knew that there was really a release from Hades; on the other side, he shows us, in the wish of Job that it might be so, the incipient tendency of the growing hope, for what a devout mind desires has an inward energy which presses forward from the subjective to the objective reality. The hope of eternal life is a flower, says one of the old commentators, which grows on the verge of the abyss. The writer of the book of Job supports this. In the midst of this abyss of the feeling of divine wrath in which Job is sunk, this flower springs up to cheer him. In its growth, however, it is not yet hope, but only at first a longing. And this longing cannot expand into hope, because no light of promise shines forth in that night, by which Job's feeling is controlled, and which makes the conflict darker than it is in itself. Scarcely has Job feasted for a short space upon the idea of that which he would gladly hope for, when the thought of the reality of that which he has to fear again overwhelms him. He seems to himself to be an evil-doer who is reserved for the execution of the sentence of death. If it is not possible in nature for mountains, rocks, stones, and the dust of the earth to resist the force of the elements, so is it an easy thing for God to destroy the hope of a mortal all at once. He forcibly thrusts him hence from this life; and when he is descended to Hades, he knows nothing whatever of the lot of his own family in the world above. Of the life and knowledge of the living, nothing remains to him but the senseless pain of his dead body, which is gnawed away, and the dull sorrow of his soul, which continues but a shadowy life in Sheôl.

Thus the poet shows us, in the third part of Job's speech, a grand idea, which tries to force its way, but cannot. In the second part, Job desired to maintain his conviction of innocence before God: his confidence is repulsed by the idea of the God who is conceived of by him as an enemy and a capricious ruler, and changes to despair. In the third part, the desire for a life after death is maintained; but he is at once overwhelmed by the imagined inevitable and eternal darkness of Sheôl, but overwhelmed soon to appear again above the billows of temptation, until, in ch. xix., the utterance of faith respecting a future life rises as a certain confidence over death and the grave: the γνώσις which comes forth from the conflict of the πίστις anticipates that better hope which in the New Testament is established and ratified by the act of redemption wrought by the Conqueror of Hades.

THE SECOND COURSE OF THE CONTROVERSY.—

CHAP. XV.—XXI.

Eliphaz' Second Speech.—Chap. xv.Schema: 10. 8. 6. 6. 6. 10. 14. 10.

[Then began Eliphaz the Temanite, and said :]

- 2 *Doth a wise man utter vain knowledge,
And fill his breast with the east wind ?*
- 3 *Contending with words, that profit not,
And speeches, by which no good is done ?*
- 4 *Moreover, thou makest void the fear of God,
And thou restrainest devotion before God ;*
- 5 *For thy mouth exposeth thy misdeeds,
And thou choosest the language of the crafty.*
- 6 *Thine own mouth condemneth thee and not I,
And thine own lips testify against thee.*

The second course of the controversy is again opened by Eliphaz, the most respectable, most influential, and perhaps oldest of the friends. Job's detailed and bitter answers seem to him as empty words and impassioned tirades, which ill become a wise man, such as he claims to be in assertions like ch. xii. 3, xiii. 2. הַחֶכֶם with He interr., like הָעֵלָה, ch. xiii. 25. רֵיחַ, wind, is the opposite of what is solid and sure ; and קְרִים in the parallel (like Hos. xii. 2) signifies what is worthless, with the additional notion of vehement action. If we translate בֶּטֶן by "belly," the meaning is apt to be misunderstood ; it is not intended as the opposite of לֵב (Ewald), but it means, especially in the book of Job, not only that which feels, but also thinks and wills, the spiritually receptive and active inner nature of man (Psychol. p. 313) ; as also in Arabic, el-battin signifies that which is within, even the deepest mystical sense. Hirz. and Renan translate the inf. abs. הוֹכִיחַ, which follows in

ver. 3, as verb. fin.: se défend-il par des vaines paroles; but though the inf. abs. is so used in an historical clause (ch. xv. 35), it is not in an interrogative. Ewald takes it as the subject: "to reprove with words—avails not, and speeches—whereby one does no good;" but though דָּבַר and מְלִים might be used without any further defining, as in λογوماχεῖν (2 Tim. ii. 14) and λογوماχία (1 Tim. vi. 4), the form of ver. 3b is opposed to such an explanation. The inf. abs. is connected as a gerund (redarguendo s. disputando) with the verbs in the question, ver. 2; and the elliptical relative clause לֹא יִכְבֵּן is best, as referring to things, according to ch. xxxv. 3: sermone (דָּבַר from דָּבַר, as sermo from serere) qui non prodest; לֹא יוֹעִיל בָּם, on the other hand, to persons, verbis quibus nil utilitatis affert. Eliphaz does not censure Job for arguing, but for defending himself by such useless and purposeless utterances of his feeling. But still more than that: his speeches are not only unsatisfactory and unbecoming, אִם, accedit quod (cumulative like ch. xiv. 3), they are moreover irreligious, since by doubting the justice of God they deprive religion of its fundamental assumption, and diminish the reverence due to God. יִרְאָה in such an objective sense as Ps. xix. 10 almost corresponds to the idea of religion. לִפְנֵי־יְהוָה is to be understood, according to Ps. cii. 1, cxlii. 3 (comp. lxiv. 2, civ. 34): before God, and consequently customary devotional meditation, here of the disposition of mind indispensable to prayer, viz. devotion, and especially reverential awe, which Job depreciates (נָרַע, detrahere). His speeches are mostly directed towards God; but they are violent and reproachful, therefore irreverent in form and substance.

Ver. 5. כִּי is not affirmative: forsooth (Hirz.), but confirmatory or explicative. This opinion respecting him, which is so sharply and definitely expressed by אִם־כֵּן, thrusts itself irresistibly forward, for it is not necessary to know his life more exactly, his own mouth, whence such words escape, reveals his sad state: docet (אָלף only in the book of Job, from אָלף, discere, a word which only occurs once in the Hebrew, Prov. xxii. 25) culpam tuam os tuum, not as Schlottm. explains, with Raschi: docet culpa tua os tuum, which, to avoid being misunderstood, must have been חטאתך האלף, and is a thought unsuited to the connection. אָלף is certainly not directly equivalent to הניד, Isa. iii. 9; it signifies to teach, to explain, and this verb is just the one in the mouth of the censorious friend. What follows must not be translated: while thou choosest (Hirz.); ונתבחר is not a circumstantial clause, but adds a second confirmatory clause to the first: he chooses the language of the crafty, since he pretends to be able to prove his innocence before God, and, although rightly attacked, he assumes the offensive (as ch. xiii. 4 sqq.) against those who exhort him to humble himself. Thus by his evil words he becomes his own judge (ירשיעך) and accuser (ךענו יענו after the fem. שפתיך, like Prov. v. 2, xxvi. 23). The knot of the controversy becomes constantly more entangled since Job strengthens the friends more and more in their false view by his speeches, which certainly are sinful in some parts (as ch. ix. 22).

- 7 *Wast thou as the first one born as a man,
And hast thou been brought forth before the hills?*
- 8 *Hast thou attended in the council of Eloah,
And hast thou kept wisdom to thyself?*
- 9 *What dost thou know that we have not known?
Dost thou understand what we have not been acquainted with?*
- 10 *Both grey-haired and aged are among us,
Older in days than thy father.*

The question in ver. 7a assumes that the first created man, because coming direct from the hand of God, had the most direct and profoundest insight into the mysteries of the world which came into existence at the same time as himself.

Schlottman calls to mind an ironical proverbial expression of the Hindus: "Yea, indeed, he is the first man; no wonder that he is so wise" (Roberts, Orient. Illustr. p. 276). It is not to be translated: wast thou born as the first man, which is as inadmissible as the translation of אחת מעט, Hag. ii. 6, by "a little" (vid. Köhler in loc.); rather ראישן (i.e. ראישון, as Josh. xxi. 10, formed from ראש, like the Arabic raïs, from ras, if it is not perhaps a mere incorrect amalgamation of the forms ראישן and רישון, ch. viii. 8) is in apposition with the subject, and אדם is to be regarded as predicate, according to Ges. § 139, 2. Raschi's translation is also impossible: wast thou born before Adam? for this Greek form of expression, πρωτός μου, John i. 15, 30, xv. 18 (comp. Odyss. xi. 481 sq., σεῖο μακάρτατος), is strange to the Hebrew. In the parallel question, ver. 7b, Umbr., Schlottm., and Renan (following Ewald) see an allusion to Prov. viii. 24 sq.: art thou the demiurgic Wisdom itself? But the introductory proverbs (Prov. ch. i.-ix.) are more recent than the book of Job (vid. supra, p. 24), and indeed probably, as we shall show elsewhere, belong to the time of Jehoshaphat. Consequently the more probable relation is that the writer of Prov. viii. 24 sq. has adopted words from the book of Job in describing the pre-existence of the Chokma. Was Job, a higher spirit-nature, brought forth, i.e. as it were amidst the pangs of travail (חוללת, Pulal from חול, חיל), before the hills? for the angels, according to Scripture, were created before man, and even before the visible universe (vid. ch. xxxviii. 4 sqq.). Hirz., Ew., Schlottm., and others erroneously translate the futt. in the questions, ver. 8, as præs. All the verbs in vers. 7, 8, are under the control of the retrospective character which is given to the verses by ראישן; comp. x. 10 sq., where זכרנא has the same influence, and also ch. iii. 3, where the historical sense of אֵלֶּיךָ depends not upon the syntax, but upon logical necessity. Translate therefore: didst thou attend in the secret council (סוד, like Jer. xxiii. 18, comp. Ps. lxxxix. 8) of Eloah (according to the correct form of writing in Codd. and in Kimchi, Michlol 54a, הַבְּסוֹד, like ver. 11 הַמַּעֲט and ch. xxii. 13 הַבְּעֵר, with Beth raph. and without *Gaja*¹), and didst then acquire for thyself (גִּרַּע, here attrahere, like the Arabic, sorbere, to suck in) wisdom? by which one is reminded of Prometheus' fire stolen from heaven. Nay, Job can boast of no extraordinary wisdom. The friends—as Eliphaz, ver. 9, says in their name—are his cotemporaries; and if he desires to appeal to the teaching of his father, and of his ancestors generally, let him know that there are hoary-headed men among themselves, whose discernment is deeper by reason of their more advanced age. נִם is inverted, like ch. ii. 10 (which see); and at the same time, since it is used twice, it is correlative: etiam inter nos et cani et senes. Most modern expositors think that Eliphaz, “in modestly concealed language” (Ewald), refers to himself. But the reference would be obvious enough; and wherefore this modest concealing, which is so little suited to the character of Eliphaz? Moreover, ver. 10a does not sound as if speaking merely of one, and in ver. 10b Eliphaz would make himself older than he appears to be, for it is nowhere implied that Job is a young man in comparison with him. We therefore with Umbreit explain בְּנֵי: in our generation. Thus it sounds more like the Arabic, both in words (kebîr Arab., usual in the signif. grandævus) and in substance. Eliphaz appeals to the source of reliable tradition, since they have even among their races and districts mature old men, and since, indeed, according to ¹ As a rule, the interrogative He, when pointed with Pathach, has Gaja against the Pathach [2 Sam. vii. 5]; this, however, falls away (among other instances) when the syllable immediately following the He has the tone, as in the two examples given above (comp. also הָאֵל, ch. viii. 3; הָאֵל, xiii. 7), or the usual Gaja (Metheg) which stands in the antepenultima (Bär, Metheg-Setzung, § 23).

Job's own admission (ch. xii. 12), there is "wisdom among the ancient ones."

- 11 *Are the consolations of God too small for thee,
And a word thus tenderly spoken with thee?*
12 *What overpowers thy heart
And why do thine eyes wink,*
13 *That thou turnest thy snorting against God,
And sendest forth such words from thy mouth?*

By the consolations of God, Eliphaz means the promises in accordance with the majesty and will of God, by which he and the other friends have sought to cheer him, of course presupposing a humble resignation to the just hand of God. By "a word (spoken) in gentleness to him," he means the gentle tone which they have maintained, while he has passionately opposed them. מְלִיץ, elsewhere מְלִיץ (e.g. Isa. viii. 6, of the softly murmuring and gently flowing Siloah), from מָלַץ (declined, מְלִיץ), with the neutral, adverbial לִי (as מְלִיץ), signifies: with a soft step, gently. The word has no connection with מָלַץ, מְלִיץ, to cover over, and is not third præteritum. (as it is regarded by Raschi, after Chajug): which he has gently said to you, or that which has gently befallen you; in which, as in Fürst's Handwörterbuch, the notions secrete (Judg. iv. 21, Targ. מְלִיץ, in secret) and leniter are referred to one root. Are these divine consolations, and these so gentle addresses, too small for thee (מַעַט מִמֶּךָ, opp. 1 Kings xix. 7), i.e. beneath thy dignity, and unworthy of thy notice? What takes away (לָקַח, auferre, abripere, as frequently) thy heart (here of wounded pride), and why do thine eyes gleam, that thou turnest (הִשְׁיִיב, not revertere, but vertere, as freq.) thy ill-humour towards God, and utterest מְלִיץ (so here, not מְלִיץ) words, which, because they are without meaning and intelligence, are nothing but words? מְלִיץ, ἄπ. γερ., is transposed from מְלִיץ, to wink, i.e. to make known by gestures and grimaces,—a word which does not occur in biblical, but is very common in post-biblical, Hebrew (e.g. חרש רומן ונרמן, a deaf and dumb person expresses himself and is answered by a language of signs). Modern expositors arbitrarily understand a rolling of the eyes; it is more natural to think of the vibration of the eye-lashes or eye-brows. ריח, ver. 13, is as in Judg. viii. 3, Isa. xxv. 4, comp. xiii. 11, and freq. used of passionate excitement, which is thus expressed because it manifests itself in πνέειν (Acts ix. 1), and has its rise in the πνεῦμα (Eccl. vii. 9). Job ought to control this angry spirit, θυμός (Psychol. p. 235); but he allows it to burst forth, and makes even God the object on which he vents his anger in impetuous language. How much better it would be for him, if he would search within himself (Lam. iii. 39) for the reason of those sufferings which so deprive him of his self-control!

- 14 *What is mortal man that he should be pure,
And that he who is born of woman should be righteous?*
15 *Behold! He trusteth not His holy ones,
And the heavens are not pure in His eyes:*
16 *How much less the abominable and corrupt,
Man, who drinketh iniquity as water!*

The exclamation in ver. 14 is like the utterance: mortal man and man born flesh of flesh cannot be entirely sinless. Even "the holy ones" and "the heavens" are not. The former are, as in ch. v. 1, according to iv. 18, the angels as beings of light (whether קִרְשׁ signifies to be light from the very first, spotlessly pure, or, vid. Psalter, i. 588 sq., to be separated, distinct, and hence exalted above what is common); the latter is not another expression for the אֲנִיְלִי מְרוֹמָא (Targ.), the "angels of the heights," but שְׁמַיִם is the word used for the highest spheres in which they dwell (comp. ch. xxv. 5); for the angels are certainly not corporeal, but, like all created things, in space, and the Scriptures everywhere speak of angels and the starry heavens together. Hence the angels are called the morning stars in ch. xxxviii. 7, and hence both stars and angels are called צָבָאֵת הַשָּׁמַיִם and צָבָאֵת (vid. Genesis, S. 128). Even the angels and the heavens are finite, and consequently are not of a nature absolutely raised above the possibility of sin and contamination.

Eliphaz repeats here what he has already said, ch. iv. 18 sq.; but he does it intentionally, since he wishes still more terribly to describe human uncleanness to Job (Oetinger). In that passage הָאֵל was merely the sign of an anti-climax, here הָאֵל is quanto minus. Eliphaz refers to the hereditary infirmity and sin of human nature in ver. 14, here (ver. 16) to man's own free choice of that which works his destruction. He uses the strongest imaginable words to describe one actualiter and originaliter corrupted. נִתְעַב denotes one who is become an abomination, or the abominated = abominable (Ges. § 134, 1); נִתְעַב, one thoroughly corrupted (Arabic alacha, in the medial VIII. conjugation: to become sour, which reminds one of ζύμη, Rabb. שֶׁאֵר שֶׁבַעֲפָה, as an image of evil, and especially of evil desire). It is further said of him (an expression which Elihu adopts, ch. xxxiv. 7), that he drinks up evil like water. The figure is like Prov. xxvi. 6, comp. on Ps. lxxiii. 10, and implies that he lusts after sin, and that it is become a necessity of his nature, and is to his nature what water is to the thirsty. Even Job does not deny this corruption of man (ch. xiv. 4), but the inferences which the friends draw in reference to him he cannot acknowledge. The continuation of Eliphaz' speech shows how they render this acknowledgment impossible to him.

17 I will inform thee, hear me !

And what I have myself seen that I will declare,

18 Things which wise men declare

Without concealment from their fathers—

19 *To them alone was the land given over,
And no stranger had passed into their midst—:*

Eliphaz, as in his first speech, introduces the dogma with which he confronts Job with a solemn preface: in the former case it had its rise in a revelation, here it is supported by his own experience and reliable tradition; for חזיתי is not intended as meaning ecstatic vision (Schlottom.). The poet uses חזיה also of sensuous vision, ch. viii. 17; and of observation and knowledge by means of the senses, not only the more exalted, as ch. xix. 26 sq., but of any kind (ch. xxiii. 9, xxiv. 1, xxvii. 12, comp. xxxvi. 25, xxxiv. 32), in the widest sense. חזי is used as neuter, Gen. vi. 15, Ex. xiii. 8, xxx. 13, Lev. xi. 4, and freq.¹ (comp. the neuter הוא, ch. xiii. 16, and often), and זה-חזיתי is a relative clause (Ges. § 122, 2): quod conspexi, as ch. xix. 19 quos amo, and Ps. lxxiv. 2 in quo habitas, comp. Ps. civ. 8, 26, Prov. xxiii. 22, where the punctuation throughout proceeds from the correct knowledge of the syntax. The waw of ואספרה is the waw apodosis, which is customary (Nägelsbach, § 111, 1, b) after relative clauses (e.g. Num. xxiii. 3), or what is the same thing, participles (e.g. Prov. xxiii. 24): et narrabo = ea narrabo. In ver. 18 ולא כחרו is, logically at least, subordinate to יגידו, as in Isa. iii. 9,² as the Targum of the Antwerp Polyglott well translates: "what wise men declare, without concealing (ולא מכרבין), from the tradition of their fathers;" whereas all the other old translations, including Luther's, have missed the right meaning. These fathers to whom this doctrine respecting the fate of evil-doers is referred, lived, as Eliphaz says in ver. 19, in the land of their birth, and did not mingle themselves with strangers ; consequently their manner of viewing things, and their opinions, have in their favour the presumption of independence, of being derived from their own experience, and also of a healthy development undisturbed by any foreign influences, and their teaching may be accounted pure and unalloyed.

¹ So also Ps. lvi. 10, where I now prefer to translate "This I know," חזי neuter, like Prov. xxiv. 12, and referring forward as above, ver. 17.

² Heidenheim refers to Hos. viii. 2 for the position of the words, but there Israel may also be an apposition: we know thee, we Israel.

Eliphaz thus indirectly says, that the present is not free from such influences, and Ewald is consequently of opinion that the individuality of the Israelitish poet peeps out here, and a state of things is indicated like that which came about after the fall of Samaria in the reign of Manasseh. Hirzel also infers from Eliphaz' words, that at the time when the book was written the poet's fatherland was desecrated by some foreign rule, and considers it an indication for determining the time at which the book was composed. But how groundless and deceptive this is ! The way in which Eliphaz commends ancient traditional lore is so genuinely Arabian, that there is but the faintest semblance of a reason for supposing the poet to have thrown his own history and national peculiarity so vividly into the working up of the rôle of another. Purity of race was, from the earliest times, considered by "the sons of the East" as the sign of highest nobility, and hence Eliphaz traces back his teaching to a time when his race could boast of the greatest freedom from intermixture with any other. Schlottmann prefers to interpret ver. 19 as referring to the "nobler primeval races of man" (without, however, referring to ch. viii. 8), but הָאָרֶץ does not signify the earth here, but : country, as in ch. xxx. 8, xxii. 8, and elsewhere, and ver. 19*b* seems to refer to nations : אֲרָ = barbarus (perhaps Semitic : בְּרִבְרִי, ὁ ἑξῆς). Nevertheless it is unnecessary to suppose that Eliphaz' time was one of foreign domination, as the Assyrian-Chaldean time was for Israel : it is sufficient to imagine it as a time when the tribes of the desert were becoming intermixed, from migration, commerce, and feud.

Now follows the doctrine of the wise men, which springs from a venerable primitive age, an age as yet undisturbed by any strange way of thinking (modern enlightenment and free thinking, as we should say), and is supported by Eliphaz' own experience.¹

¹ Communication from Consul Wetzstein: If this verse affirms that the freer a people is from intermixture with other races, the purer is its tradition, it gives expression to a principle derived from experience, which needs no proof. Even European races, especially the Scandinavians, furnish proof of this in their customs, language, and traditions, although in this case certain elements of their indigenous character have vanished with the introduction of Christianity. A more complete parallel is furnished by the wandering tribes of the 'Aneze and Sharârât of the Syrian deserts, people who have indeed had their struggles, and have even been weakened by emigration, but have certainly never lost their political and religious autonomy, and have preserved valuable traditions which may be traced to the earliest antiquity. It is unnecessary to prove this by special instances, when the whole outer and inner life of these peoples can be regarded as the best commentary on the biblical accounts of the patriarchal age. It is, however, not so much the fact that the evil-doer receives his punishment, in favour of which Eliphaz appeals to the teaching handed down from the fathers, as rather the belief in it, consequently in a certain degree the dogma of a moral order in the world. This dogma is an essential element of the ancient Abrahamic religion of the desert tribes—that primitive religion which formed the basis of the Mosaic, and side by side with it was continued among the nomads of the desert; which, shortly before the appearance of Christianity in the country east of Jordan, gave birth to mild doctrines, doctrines which tended to prepare the way for the teaching of the gospel; which at that very time, according to historical testimony, also prevailed in the towns of the Higâz, and was first displaced again by the Jemanic idolatry, and limited to the desert, in the second century after Christ, during the repeated migrations of the southern Arabs; which gave the most powerful impulse to the rise of Islam, and furnished its best elements; which, towards the end of the last century, brought about the reform of Islamism in the province of Negd, and produced the Wahabee doctrine; and which, finally, is continued even to the present day by the name of Dîn Ibrâhîm, "Religion of Abraham," as a faithful tradition of the fathers, among the vast Ishmaelitish tribes of the Syrian desert, "to whom alone the land is given over, and into whose midst no stranger has penetrated." Had this cultus spread among settled races with a higher education, it might have been taught also in writings: if, however, portions of writings in reference to it, which have been handed

- 20 *So long as the ungodly liveth he suffereth,
And numbered years are reserved for the tyrant.*
- 21 *Terrors sound in his ears;
In time of peace the destroyer cometh upon him.*
- 22 *He believeth not in a return from darkness,
And he is selected for the sword.*
- 23 *He roameth about after bread: "Ah! where is it?"
He knoweth that a dark day is near at hand for him.*
- 24 *Trouble and anguish terrify him;
They seize him as a king ready to the battle.*

All the days of the ungodly he (the ungodly) is sensible of pain. עֲשָׂה stands, like Elohim in Gen. ix. 6, by the closer definition; here however so, that this defining ends after the manner of a premiss, and is begun by הִנֵּה after the manner of a conclusion. מִתְחַלֵּל, he writhes, i.e. suffers inward anxiety down to us by the Arabs, are to be regarded as unauthentic, it may also in 'Irâk have been mixed with the Sabian worship of the stars; but among the nomads it will have always been only oral, taught by the poets in song, and contained in the fine traditions handed down uncorrupted from father to son, and practised in life.

It is a dogma of this religion (of which I shall speak more fully in the introduction to my Anthologie von Poesien der Wanderstämme), that the pious will be rewarded by God in his life and in his descendants, the wicked punished in his life and in his descendants; and it may also, in ver. 19, be indirectly said that the land of Eliphaz has preserved this faith, in accordance with tradition, purer than Job's land. If Eliphaz was from the Petræan town of Têmân (which we merely suggest as possible here), he might indeed rightly assert that no strange race had become naturalized there; for that hot, sterile land, poorly supplied with water, had nothing inviting to the emigrant or marauder, and its natives remain there only by virtue of the proverb: lôlâ hhibb el-wattan qat.tâl, lakân dêr es-sû' charâb, "Did not the love of one's country slay (him who is separated from it), the barren country would be uninhabited." Job certainly could not affirm the same of his native country, if this is, with the Syrian tradition, to be regarded as the Nukra (on this point, vid. the Appendix). As the richest province of Syria, it has, from the earliest time to the present, always been an apple of contention, and has not only frequently changed its rulers, but even its inhabitants.

and distress in the midst of all outward appearance of happiness. Most expositors translate the next line : and throughout the number of the years, which are reserved to the tyrant. But (1) this parallel definition of time appended by waw makes the sense drawling ; (2) the change of עֲרִיץ (oppressor, tyrant) for רֶשֶׁע leads one to expect a fresh affirmation, hence it is translated by the LXX. : ἔτη δὲ ἀριθμητὰ δεδομένα δυνάστη. The predicate is, then, like ch. xxxii. 7, comp. xxix. 10, 1 Sam. ii. 4 (Ges. § 148), per attractionem in the plur. instead of in the sing., and especially with מִסְפָּר followed by gen. plur., this attraction is adopted by our author, ch. xxi. 21, xxxviii. 21. The meaning is not, that numbered, i.e. few, years are secretly appointed to the tyrant, which must have been sh'nóth mispâr, a reversed position of the words, as ch. xvi. 22, Num. ix. 20 (vid. Gesenius' Thes.) ; but a (limited, appointed) number of years is reserved to the tyrant (צֶפֶן as ch. xxiv. 1, xxi. 19, comp. טָמַן, ch. xx. 26 ; Mercerus : occulto decreto definiti), after the expiration of which his punishment begins. The thought expressed by the Targ., Syr., and Jerome would be suitable : and the number of the years (that he has to live unpunished) is hidden from the tyrant ; but if this were the poet's meaning, he would have written שְׁנָיו, and must have written מִן־הָעֲרִיץ.

With regard to the following vers. 21-24, it is doubtful whether only the evil-doer's anxiety of spirit is described in amplification of הוּא מִתְחַלֵּל, or also how the terrible images from which he suffers in his conscience are realized, and how he at length helplessly succumbs to the destruction which his imagination had long foreboded. A satisfactory and decisive answer to this question is hardly possible ; but considering that the real crisis is brought on by Eliphaz later, and fully described, it seems more probable that what has an objective tone in vers. 21-24 is controlled by what has been affirmed respecting the evil conscience of the ungodly, and is to be understood accordingly. The sound of terrible things (startling dangers) rings in his ears; the devastator comes upon him (בוא seq. acc. as ch. xx. 22, Prov. xxviii. 22; comp. Isa. xxviii. 15) in the midst of his prosperity. He anticipates it ere it happens. From the darkness by which he feels himself menaced, he believes not (האמין seq. infin. as Ps. xxvii. 13, לראות, of confident hope) to return; i.e. overwhelmed with a consciousness of his guilt, he cannot, in the presence of this darkness which threatens him, rise to the hope of rescue from it, and he is really—as his consciousness tells him—צפּי (like עשׂי, ch. xli. 25; Ges. § 75, rem. 5; Keri צפּוי, which is omitted in our printed copies, contrary to the testimony of the Masora and the authority of correct mss.), spied out for, appointed to the sword, i.e. of God (ch. xix. 29; Isa. xxxi. 8), or decreed by God. In the midst of abundance he is harassed by the thought of becoming poor; he wanders about in search of bread, anxiously looking out and asking where? (abrupt, like הנה, ch. ix. 19), i.e. where is any to be found, whence can I obtain it? The LXX. translates contrary to the connection, and with a strange misunderstanding of the passage: κατατέτακται δὲ εἰς σῖτα γυψίν (לחם אֵיה, food for the vulture). He sees himself in the mirror of the future thus reduced to beggary; he knows that a day of darkness stands in readiness (נכון, like ch. xviii. 12), is at his hand, i.e. close upon him (בִּירוֹ, elsewhere in this sense לִיר, Ps. cxl. 6, 1 Sam. xix. 3, and עַל־יְרִי, ch. i. 14). In accordance with the previous exposition, we shall now interpret צר וּמְצוֹקָה, ver. 24, not of need and distress, but subjectively of fear and oppression. They come upon him suddenly and irresistibly; it seizes or overpowers him (תִּתְקַפֵּהוּ with neutral subject: an unknown something, a dismal power) as a king עֲתִיד לְבִירוֹ. LXX. ὥσπερ στρατηγὸς πρωτοστάτης πίπτων, like a leader falling in the first line of the battle, which is an imaginary interpretation of the text. The translation of the Targum also, sicut regem qui paratus est ad scabellum (to serve the conqueror as a footstool), furnishes no explanation. Another Targum translation (in Nachmani and elsewhere) is: sicut rex qui paratus est circumdare se legionibus. According to this, כִּירוֹר comes from כָּרַר, to surround, be round (comp. כָּתַר, whence כָּתַר, Assy. cudur, κῦδαῖς, perhaps also כָּוַר, Syr. כַּר, whence chêdor, a circle, round about); and it is assumed, that as כָּרַר signifies a ball (not only in Talmudic, but also in Isa. xxii. 18, which is to be translated: rolling he rolleth thee into a ball, a ball into a spacious land), so כִּירוֹר, a round encampment, an army encamped in a circle, synon. of מַעֲקָל. In this first signification the word certainly furnishes no suitable sense in connection with עָתִיד; but one may, with Kimchi, suppose that כִּירוֹר, like the Italian tornimento, denotes the circle as well as the tournament, or the round of conflict, i.e. the conflict which moves round about, like tumult of battle, which last is a suitable meaning here. The same appropriate meaning is attained, however, if the root is taken, like the Arabic كَدَر, in the signification turbidum esse (comp. קָדַר, ch. vi. 16), which is adopted of misfortunes as troubled experiences of life (according to which Schultens translates: destinatus est ad turbulentissimas fortunas, beginning a new thought with עָתִיד, which is not possible, since כִּמְלָךְ by itself is no complete figure), and may perhaps also be referred to the tumult of battle, tumultus bellici conturbatio (Rosenm.); or if, with Fleischer, one starts from another turn of the idea of the root, viz. to be compressed, solid, thick, which in a more certain way gives the meaning of a dense crowd.¹ Since, therefore, a suitable meaning is obtained in two ways, the natural conjecture, which is commended by Prov. vi. 11, עתיד לִבְרוֹן, paratus ad hastam = peritus hastæ (Hupf.), according to ch. iii. 8 (where עֵר = לְעֵר), may be abandoned. The signification circuitus has the most support, according to which Saadia and Parchon also explain, and we have preferred to translate round of battle rather than tumult of conflict; Jerome's translation, qui præparatur ad prælium, seems also to be gained in the same manner.

down, chiefly of water and other fluids, as of the rain which pours down from heaven, of a cascade, and the like ; then improperly of a bird of prey which shoots down from the air upon its prey (e.g. in the poetry in Beidhâwi on Sur. 81, 2 : "The hawk saw some bustards on the plain f'ancadara, and rushed down"); of a hostile host which rushes upon the enemy [first possible signification for כִּירוֹר] ; of a man, horse, etc., which runs very swiftly, effuse currit, effuso curru ruit ; of the stars that shall fall from heaven at the last day (Sur. 81, 2). Then also II. intransitive cadara (fut. jacdiru) with the secondary form cadira (fut. jacdaru) and cadura (fut. jacduru), prop. to be shaken and jolted ; then also of fluid things, mixed and mingled, made turgid, unclean, i.e. by shaking, jolting, stirring, etc., with the dregs (the cudâre or cudâde) ; then gen. turbidum, non limpidum esse (opp. صفا), with a similar transition of meaning to that in turbare (comp. deturbare) and the German trüben (comp. traben or trappen, treiben, treffen). The primary meaning of the root takes another III. turn in the derived adjectives cadur, cudurr, cundur, cunâdir, compressed, solid, thick ; the last word with us (Germans) forms a transition from cadir, cadr, cadir, dull, slimy, yeasty, etc., inasmuch as we speak of dicke Bier (thick beer), etc., cerevisia spissa, de la bière épaisse. Here the point of contact for the word כִּירוֹר, tumult of battle, κλόνος ἀνδρῶν, seems indicated : a dense crowd and tumult, where one is close upon another ; as also גִּלְחָמָה, מִלְחָמָה, signify not reciprocal destruction, slaughter, but to press firmly and closely upon one another, a dense crowd.—FL.

This strophe has periodic members : vers. 25-28 an antecedent clause with a double beginning (פִּי־נֹטָה) because he has stretched out, פִּי־כֶסֶה because he has covered ; whereas יִרְוֶן may be taken as more independent, but under the government of the כִּי that stands at the commencement of the sentence) ; vers. 29, 30, is the conclusion. Two chief sins are mentioned as the cause of the final destiny that comes upon the evil-doer : (1) his arrogant opposition to God, and (2) his contentment on the ruins of another's prosperity. The first of these sins is described vers. 25-27. The fut. consec. is once used instead of the perf., and the simple fut. is twice used with the signification of an imperf. (as ch. iv. 3 and freq.) The Hithpa. הִתְנַבֵּר signifies here to maintain a heroic bearing, to play the hero ; הִתְעַשֵּׂר to make one's self rich, to play the part of a rich man, Prov. xiii. 7. And בְּצוּאר expresses the special prominence of the neck in his assailing God (רִוֶן אֵל, as Dan. viii. 6, comp. עַל, ch. xvi. 14) ; it is equivalent to erecto collo (Vulg.), and in meaning equivalent to ὑβρεῖ (LXX.). Also in Ps. lxxv. 6, בְּצוּאר (with Munach, which there represents a distinctive¹) is absolute, in the sense of stiff-necked or hard-headed ; for the parallels, as Ps. xxxi. 19, xciv. 4, and especially the primary passage, 1 Sam. ii. 3, show that עָתָק is to be taken as an accusative of the object. The proud defiance with which he challengingly assails God, and renders himself insensible to the dispensations of God, which might bring him to a right way of thinking, is symbolized by the additional clause: with the thickness (עָבִי cognate form to עָבִי) of the bosses of his shields. נֶבֶךְ is the back (ظهر) or boss (umbo) of the shield; the plurality of shields has reference to the diversified means by which he hardens himself. Ver. 27, similarly to Ps. lxxiii. 4-7, pictures this impregnable carnal security against all unrest and pain, to which, on account of his own sinfulness and the distress of others, the nobler-minded man is so sensitive: he has covered his face with his fat, so that by the accumulation of fat, for which he anxiously labours, it becomes a gross material lump of flesh, devoid of mind and soul, and made fat, i.e. added fat, caused it to accumulate, upon his loins (בְּסִלִּי for בְּסִלִּי); עָשָׂה (which has nothing to do with غشى, to cover) is used as in ch. xiv. 9, and in the phrase corpus facere (in Justin), in the sense of producing outwardly something from within. פִּימָה reminds one of πιμ-ελη (as Aquila and Symmachus translate here), o-pim-us, and of the Sanscrit piai, to be fat (whence adj. pîvan, pîvara, πιαρός, part. pîna, subst. according to Roth pîvas); the Arabic renders it probable that it is a contraction of פִּימָה (Olsh. § 171, b). The Jewish expositors explain it according to the misunderstood פִּימָה, 1 Sam. xiii. 21, of the furrows or wrinkles which are formed in flabby flesh, as if the ah were paragogic.

Ver. 28 describes the second capital sin of the evil-doer. The desolated cities that he dwells in are not cities that he himself has laid waste; 28c distinctly refers to a divinely appointed punishment, for הִתְעַרְבִי does not signify: which they (evil-doers) have made ruins for themselves (Hahn), which is neither probable from the change of number, nor accords with the meaning of the verb, which signifies "to appoint to something in the future." Hirzel, by referring to the law, Deut. xiii. 13-19 (comp. 1 Kings xvi. 34), which forbids the rebuilding of such cities as are laid under the curse, explains it to a certain extent more correctly. But such an allusion to a requirement of the Mosaic law is in itself not probable in the book of Job, and here, as Löwenthal rightly remarks, is the less indicated, since it is not the dwelling in such cities that is forbidden, but only the rebuilding of them, so far as they had been destroyed; here, however, the reference is only to dwelling, not to rebuilding. The expression must therefore be understood more generally thus, that the powerful man settles down carelessly and indolently, without any fear of the judgments of God or respect for the manifestations of His judicial authority, in places in which the marks of a just divine retribution are still visible, and which are appointed to be perpetual monuments of the execution of divine judgments.¹ Only by this rendering is the form of expression of the elliptical clause לֹא יֵשְׁבוּ לָמוֹ explained. Hirz. refers לָמוֹ to בְּתֵימִים: in which they do not dwell; but יֵשֵׁב לְ does not signify: to dwell in a place, but: to settle down in a place; Schlottm. refers לָמוֹ to the inhabitants: therein they dwell not themselves, i.e. where no one dwelt; but the אִשֶּׁר which would be required in this case as acc. localis could not be omitted.

¹ For the elucidation of this interpretation of the passage, Consul Wetzstein has contributed the following: "As one who yields to inordinate passion is without sympathy cast from human society because he is called muqâtal rabbuh, 'one who is beaten in the conflict against his God' (since he has sinned against the holy command of chastity), and as no one ventures to pronounce the name of Satan because God has cursed him (Gen. iii. 14), without adding 'alêh el-la'ne, 'God's curse upon him!' so a man may not presume to inhabit places which God has appointed to desolation. Such villages and cities, which, according to tradition, have perished and been frequently overthrown (maqlûbe, muqêlîbe, munqalibe) by the visitation of divine judgment, are not uncommon on the borders of the desert. They are places, it is said, where the primary commandments of the religion of Abraham (Dîn Ibrâhîm) have been impiously transgressed. Thus the city of Babylon will never be colonized by a Semitic tribe, because they hold the belief that it has been destroyed on account of Nimrod's apostasy from God, and his hostility to His favoured one, Abraham. The tradition which has even been transferred by the tribes of Arabia Petræa into Islamism of the desolation of the city of Higr (or

One might more readily, with Hahn, explain : those to whom they belong do not inhabit them ; but it is linguistically impossible for לָמוּ to stand alone as the expression of this subject (the possessors). The most natural, and also an admissible explanation, is, that יִשְׁבוּ refers to the houses, and that לָמוּ, which can be used not only of persons, but also of things, is dat. ethicus. The meaning, however, is not : which are uninhabited, which would not be expressed as future, but rather by יִשְׁבוּ בָהֶם אֵין or similarly, but : which shall not inhabit, i.e. shall not be inhabited to them (יִשְׁבוּ, to dwell = to have inhabitants, as Isa. xiii. 10, Jer. l. 13, 39, and freq.), or, as we should express it, which ought to remain uninhabited.

Ver. 29 begins the conclusion : (because he has acted thus) he shall not be rich (with a personal subject as Hos. xii. 9, and יַעֲשֶׂר to be written with a sharpened ש, like יַעֲזִיר above, ch. xii. 15), and his substance shall not endure (קִים, to take place, Isa. vii. 7 ; to endure, 1 Sam. xiii. 14 ; and hold fast, ch. xli. 18), and מִנְלָם shall not incline itself to the earth. The interpretation of the older expositors, non extendet se in terra, is impossible—that must be יִנָּמָה בָּאָרֶץ ; whereas Medâin Sâlih) on account of disobedience to God, prevents any one from dwelling in that remarkable city, which consists of thousands of dwellings cut in the rock, some of which are richly ornamented ; without looking round, and muttering prayers, the desert ranger hurries through, even as does the great procession of pilgrims to Mekka, from fear of incurring the punishment of God by the slightest delay in the accursed city. The destruction of Sodom, brought about by the violation of the right of hospitality (Gen. xix. 5, comp. Job xxxi. 32), is to be mentioned here, for this legend certainly belongs originally to the 'Dîn Ibrâhîm' rather than to the Mosaic. At the source of the Rakkâd (the largest river of the Golan region) there are a number of erect and remarkably perforated jasper formations, which are called 'the bridal procession' (el-fârîda). This bridal procession was turned to stone, because a woman of the party cleaned her child that had made itself dirty with a bread-cake (qurss). Near it is its village (Ufâne), which in spite of repeated attempts is no more to be inhabited. It remains forsaken, as an eternal witness that ingratitude (kufân en-nîma), especially towards God, does not remain unpunished."

Kal is commonly used in the intransitive sense to bow down, bend one's self or incline (Ges. § 53, 2). But what is the meaning of the subject מְנַלֵּם? We may put out of consideration those interpretations that condemn themselves: מִן לָם, ex iis (Targ.), or מִן לָם, quod iis, what belongs to them (Saad.), or מְנַלֵּם, their word (Syr. and Gecatilia), and such substitutions as σκιάν (צֶלֶם or צֶלֶלֶם) of the LXX., and radicem of Jerome (which seems only to be a guess). Certainly that which throws most light on the signification of the word is כְּנִלְתָּהּ (for כְּנִלְתָּהּ with Dag. dirimens, as ch. xvii. 2), which occurs in Isa. xxxiii. 1. The oldest Jewish lexicographers take this כְּנִלְתָּהּ (parall. הִתָּם) as a synonym of כָּלָה in the signification, to bring to an end; on the other hand, Ges., Knobel, and others, consider כְּנִלְתָּהּ to be the original reading, because the meaning perficere is not furnished for נָלָה from the Arab. نَال, and because نَال, standing thus together, is in Arabic an incompatible root combination (Olsh. § 9, 4). This union of consonants certainly does not occur in any Semitic root, but the Arab. nāla (the long a of which can in the inflection become a short changeable vowel) furnishes sufficient protection for this one exception; and the meaning consequi, which belongs to the Arab. nāla, fut. janīlu, is perfectly suited to Isa. xxxiii. 1: if thou hast fully attained (Hiph. as intensive of the transitive Kal, like הִקְנָה, הִזְעִיק) to plundering. If, however, the verb נָלָה is established, there is no need for any conjecture in the passage before us, especially since the improvement nearest at hand, מְנַלֵּם (Hupf. מְנַלֵּה), produces a sentence (non figet in terra caulam) which could not be flatter and tamer; whereas the thought that is gained by Olshausen's more sensible conjecture, מְנַלֵּם (their sickle does not sink to the earth, is not pressed down by the richness of the produce of the field), goes to the other extreme.¹ Juda b. Karisch (Kureisch)

has explained the word correctly by منالهم: that which they have offered (from nâla, janûlu) or attained (nâla, janûlu), i.e. their possession¹ (not: their perfection, as it is chiefly explained by the Jewish expositors, according to נלה = בלה). When the poet says, "their prosperity inclines not to the ground," he denies to it the likeness to a field of corn, which from the weight of the ears bows itself towards the ground, or to a tree, whose richly laden branches bend to the ground. We may be satisfied with this explanation (Hirz., Ew., Stickel, and most others): מנלם from מנלה (with which Kimchi compares מכרם, Num. xx. 19, which however is derived not from מכרה, but from מכר), similar in meaning to the post-biblical ממון, μαμωνᾶς; the suff., according to the same change of number as in ver. 35, ch. xx. 23, and freq., refers to רשעים. In ver. 30, also, a figure taken from a plant is interwoven with what is said of the person of the ungodly: the flame withers up his tender branch without its bearing fruit, and he himself does not escape darkness, but rather perishes by the breath of His mouth, i.e. God's mouth (ch. iv. 9, not to the supposition of a substantive נמל in this signification, according to the usual application of the language.

¹ Freytag has erroneously placed the infinitives nail and manâl under נל med. Wau, instead of under נל med. Je, where he only repeats nail, and erroneously gives manâl the signification donum, citing in support of it a passage from Fâkîhat al-chulafâ, where 'azîz al-manâl (a figure borrowed from places difficult of access, and rendered strong and impregnable by nature or art) signifies "one who was hard to get at" (i.e. whose position of power is made secure). The true connection is this: נל med. Wau signifies originally to extend, reach, to hand anything to any one with outstretched arm or hand, the correlatum נל med. Je: to attain, i.e. first to touch or reach anything with outstretched arm or hand, and then really to grasp and take it, gen. adipisci, consequi, assequi, impe-trare, with the ordinary infinitives nail and manâl. Therefore manâl (from נל med. Je) signifies primarily as abstract, attainment; it may then, however, like nail and the infinitives generally, pass over to the concrete signification: what one attains to, or what one has attained, gotten, although I can give no special example in support of it.—FL.

of his own, after Isa. xxxiii. 11). The repetition of יסור ("he escapes not," as Prov. xiii. 14; "he must yield to," as 1 Kings xv. 14, and freq.) is an impressive play upon words.

For evil shall be his possession.*

- 33 *He teareth off as a vine his young grapes,
And He casteth down as an olive-tree his flower.*

לֹא does not merely introduce a declaration respecting the future (Luther : he will not continue, which moreover must have been expressed by the Niph.), but is admonitory : may he only not trust in vanity (Munach here instead of Dechî, according to the rule of transformation, Psalter, ii. 504, § 4)—he falls, so far as he does it, into error, or brings himself into error (נִתְּעָה, 3 præt., not part., and Niph. like Isa. xix. 14, where it signifies to be thrust backwards and forwards, or to reel about helplessly),—a thought one might expect after the admonition (Olsh. conjectures נִתְּעָב, one who is detestable) : this trusting in evil is self-delusion, for evil becomes his exchange (תַּמְוָרָה not compensatio, but permutatio, acquisitio). We have translated נֹשֵׁא by "evil" (Unheil), by which we have sought elsewhere to render נֹשֵׂא, in order that we might preserve the same word in both members of the verse. In ver. 31a, נֹשֵׂא (in form = נֹשֵׂא from נֹשֵׂא, in the Chethib נֹשֵׂא, the Aleph being cast away, like the Arabic سَوْء, wickedness, from the v. cavum hamzatum sâ-'a = sawu'a) is waste and empty in mind, in 31b (comp. Hos. xii. 12) waste and empty in fortune; or, to go further from the primary root, in the former case apparent goodness, in the latter apparent prosperity—delusion, and being undeceived [“evil” in the sense of wickedness, and of calamity]. תַּמְלִיךְ, which follows, refers to the exchange, or neutrally to the evil that is exchanged: the one or the other fulfils itself, i.e. either: is realized (passive of מָלַא, 1 Kings viii. 15), or: becomes complete, which means the measure of the punishment of his immorality becomes full, before his natural day, i.e. the day of death, is come (comp. for expression, ch. xxii. 16, Eccles. vii. 17). The translation: then it is over with him (Ges., Schlottm., and others), is contrary to the usage of the language; and that given by the Jewish expositors, תַּמְלִיךְ = תַּמְלִיל (absconditur or conteritur), is a needlessly bold suggestion.—Ver. 32b. It is to be observed that רַעֲנָנָה is Milel, and consequently 3 præt., not as in Cant. i. 16 Milra, and consequently adj. בִּפְּהָ is not the branches generally (Luzzatto, with Raschi: branchage), but, as the proverbial expression for the high and low, Isa. ix. 13, xix. 15 (vid. Dietrich, Abhandlung zur hebr. Gramm. S. 209), shows, the palm-branch bent downwards (comp. Targ. Esth. i. 5, where בִּפְּהָ signifies seats and walks covered with foliage). “His palm-branch does not become green, or does not remain green” (which Symm. well renders: οὐκ ἐνθαλήσκει), means that as he himself, the palm-trunk, so also his family, withers away. In ver. 33 it is represented as בִּפְּהָ (= בִּפְּהָ), sour grapes, or the unripe grapes of a vine, and as נֶצֶחַ, flowers of an olive.¹ In ver. 33b the godless man himself might be the subject: he casts down, like an olive-tree, his flowers, but in ver 33a this is inadmissible; if we interpret: "he shakes off (Targ. יָתַר, excutiet), like a vine-stock, his young grapes," this (apart from the far-fetched meaning of יִחְמַם) is a figure that is untrue to nature, since the grapes sit firmer the more unripe they are; and if one takes the first meaning of חָמַם, "he acts unjustly, as a vine, to his omphax" (e.g. Hupf.), whether it means that he does not let it ripen, or that he does not share with it any of the sweet sap, one has not only an indistinct figure, but also (since what God ordains for the godless is described as in operation) an awkward comparison. The subject of both verbs is therefore other than the vine and olive themselves. But why only an impersonal "one"? In ver. 30 רוּחַ פִּי was referred to God, who is not expressly mentioned. God is also the subject here, and יִחְמַם, which signifies to act with violence to one's self, is modified here to the sense of tearing away, as Lam. ii. 6 (which Aben-Ezra has compared), of tearing out; כִּזִּית, כִּנָּפֶן, prop. as a vine-stock, as an olive-tree, is equivalent to even as such an one.

Ver. 34 declares the lot of the family of the ungodly, which has been thus figuratively described, without figure: the congregation (i.e. here: family-circle) of the ungodly (חֲנִיף) according to its etymon inclinans, propensus ad malum, vid. on ch. xiii. 16) is (as it is expressed from the standpoint of the judgment that is executed) גִּלְמִיד, a hard, lifeless, stony mass (in the substantival sense of the Arabic galimûd instead of the adjunct. גִּלְמִידָה, Isa. xlix. 21), i.e. stark dead (LXX.

prepare almost every kind of food. The people are exceedingly fond of things sour, a taste which is caused by the heat of the climate. During the months of June, July, and August, above six hundred horses and asses laden with unripe grapes come daily to the market in Damascus alone, and during this season no one uses vinegar; hence the word בִּסְרָא signifies in Syriac the acid (vinegar) αὐτ' ἐξοχαγῆ. In Arabic the unripe grapes are exclusively called hhossrum (حصرم), or, with a dialectic distinction, hissrim.—WETZST.

θάνατος; Aq., Symm., Theod., ἄκαρπος), and fire has devoured the tents of bribery (after Ralbag: those built by bribery; or even after the LXX.: οἴκους δωροδεκτῶν). The ejaculatory conclusion, ver. 35, gives the briefest expression to that which has been already described. The figurative language, ver. 35*a*, is like Ps. vii. 15, Isa. lix. 4 (comp. supra, p. 25); in the latter passage similar vividly descriptive infinitives are found (Ges. § 131, 4, b). They hatch the burdens or sorrow of others, and what comes from it is evil for themselves. What therefore their מַצָּרִים, i.e. their inward part, with the intermingled feelings, thoughts, and strugglings (Olympiodorus: κοιλίαν ὅλον τὸ ἐντὸς χωρίου φησὶ καὶ αὐτὴν τὴν ψυχὴν), prepares or accomplishes (רָצָה similar to ch. xxvii. 17, xxxviii. 41), that on which it works, is מַרְמֵס, deceit, with which they deceive others, and before all, themselves (New Test. ἀπάτη).

With the speech of Eliphaz, the eldest among the friends, who gives a tone to their speeches, the controversy enters upon a second stage. In his last speech Job has turned from the friends and called upon them to be silent; he turned to God, and therein a sure confidence, but at the same time a challenging tone of irreverent defiance, is manifested. God does not enter into the controversy which Job desires; and the consequence is, that that flickering confidence is again extinguished, and the tone of defiance is changed into despair and complaint. Instead of listening to the voice of God, Job is obliged to content himself again with that of the friends, for they believe the continuance of the contest to be just as binding upon them as upon Job. They cannot consider themselves overcome, for their dogma has grown up in such inseparable connection with their idea of God, and therefore is so much raised above human contradiction, that nothing but a divine fact can break through it. And they are too closely connected with Job by their friendship to leave him to himself as a heretic ; they regard Job as one who is self-deluded, and have really the good intention of converting their friend.

Eliphaz' speech, however, also shows that they become still more and more incapable of producing a salutary impression on Job. For, on the one hand, in this second stage of the controversy also they turn about everywhere only in the circle of their old syllogism : suffering is the punishment of sin, Job suffers, therefore he is a sinner who has to make atonement for his sin ; on the other hand, instead of being disconcerted by the unconditioned acceptance of this maxim, they are strengthened in it. For while at the beginning the conclusio was urged upon them only by premises raised above any proof, so that they take for granted sins of Job which were not otherwise known to them ; now, as they think, Job has himself furnished them with proof that he is a sinner who has merited such severe suffering. For whoever can speak so thoughtlessly and passionately, so vexatiously and irreverently, as Job has done, is, in their opinion, his own accuser and judge. It remains unperceived by them that Job's mind has lost its balance by reason of the fierceness of his temptation, and that in it nature and grace have fallen into a wild, confused conflict. In those speeches they see the true state of Job's spirit revealed. What, before his affliction, was the determining principle of his inner life, seems to them now to be brought to light in the words of the sufferer. Job is a godless one ; and if he does affirm his innocence so solemnly and strongly, and challenges the decision of God, this assurance is only hypocritical, and put on against his better knowledge and conscience, in order to disconcert his accusers, and to evade their admonitions to repentance. It is לשון ערומים, a mere stratagem, like that of one who is guilty, who thinks he can overthrow the accusations brought against him by assuming the bold bearing of the accuser. Seb. Schmid counts up quinque vitia, with which Eliphaz in the introduction to his speech (ch. xv. 1-13) reproaches Job: vexatious impious words, a crafty perversion of the matter, blind assumption of wisdom, contempt of the divine word, and defiance against God. Of these reproaches the first and last are well-grounded; Job does really sin in his language and attitude towards God. With respect to the reproach of assumed wisdom, Eliphaz pays Job in the same coin; and when he reproaches Job with despising the divine consolations and gentle admonitions they have addressed to him, we must not blame the friends, since their intention is good. If, however, Eliphaz reproaches Job with calculating craftiness, and thus regards his affirmation of his innocence as a mere artifice, the charge cannot be more unjust, and must certainly produce the extremest alienation between them. It is indeed hard that Eliphaz regards the testimony of Job's conscience as self-delusion; he goes still further, and pronounces it a fine-spun lie, and denies not only its objective but also its subjective truth. Thus the breach between Job and the friends widens, the entanglement of the controversy becomes more complicated, and the poet allows the solution of the enigma to ripen, by its becoming increasingly enigmatical and entangled.

In this second round of the friends' speeches we meet with no new thoughts whatever; only "in the second circle of the dispute everything is more fiery than in the first" (Oetinger): the only new thing is the harsher and more decided tone of their maintenance of the doctrine of punishment, with which they confront Job. They cannot go beyond the narrow limits of their dogma of retribution, and confine themselves now to even the half of that narrowness; for since Job contemns the consolations of God with which they have hitherto closed their speeches, they now exclusively bring forward the terrible and gloomy phase of their dogma in opposition to him. After Eliphaz has again given prominence to the universal sinfulness of mankind, which Job does not at all deny, he sketches from his own experience and the tradition of his ancestors, which demands respect by reason of their freedom from all foreign influence, with brilliant lines, a picture of the evil-doer, who, being tortured by the horrors of an evil conscience, is overwhelmed by the wrath of God in the midst of his prosperity; and his possessions, children, and whole household are involved in his ruin. The picture is so drawn, that in it, as in a mirror, Job shall behold himself and his fate, both what he has already endured and what yet awaits him. מרמה is the final word of the admonitory conclusion of his speech: Job is to know that that which fills up his inward parts is a fearful lie.

But what Job affirms of himself as the righteous one, is not מרמה. He knows that he is טמא מטמא (ch. xiv. 4), but he also knows that he is as צדיק חמים (ch. xii. 4). He is conscious of the righteousness of his endeavour, which rests on the groundwork of a mind turned to the God of salvation, therefore a believing mind,—a righteousness which is also accepted of God. The friends know nothing whatever of this righteousness which is available before God. Fateor quidem, says Calvin in his Institutiones, iii. 12, in libro Iob mentionem fieri justitiæ, quæ excelsior est observatione legis; et hanc distinctionem tenere operæ pretium est, quia etiamsi quis legi satisfaceret, ne sic quidem staret ad examen illius justitiæ, quæ sensus omnes exsuperat. Mercier rightly observes. Eliphaz perstringit hominis naturam, quæ tamen per fidem pura redditur. In man Eliphaz sees only the life of nature and not the life of grace, which, because it is the work of God, makes man irreproachable before God. He sees in Job only the rough shell, and not the kernel; only the hard shell, and not the pearl. We know, however, from the prologue, that Jehovah acknowledged Job as His servant when he decreed suffering for him; and this sufferer, whom the friends regard as one smitten of God, is and remains, as this truly evangelical book will show to us, the servant of Jehovah.

Job's First Answer.—Chap. xvi. xvii.

Schema : 10. 10. 5. 8. 6. 10 | 5. 6. 8. 7. 8.

[Then began Job, and said :]

Ch. xvi. 2 I have now heard such things in abundance,

Troublesome comforters are ye all !

3 Are windy words now at an end,

Or what goadeth thee that thou answerest ?

4 I also would speak like you,

If only your soul were in my soul's stead.

I would weave words against you,

And shake my head at you ;

5 I would encourage you with my mouth,

And the solace of my lips should soothe you.

The speech of Eliphaz, as of the other two, is meant to be comforting. It is, however, primarily an accusation ; it wounds instead of soothing. Of this kind of speech, says Job, one has now heard רבות, much, i.e. (in a pregnant sense) amply sufficient, although the word might signify elliptically (Ps. cvi. 43 ; comp. Neh. ix. 28) many times (Jer. *frequent*er); multa (as ch. xxiii. 14) is, however, equally suitable, and therefore is to be preferred as the more natural. Ver. 2*b* shows how בְּאַלְפָה is intended ; they are altogether מְנַחֲמֵי עֹמֶל, consolatores onerosi (Jer.), such as, instead of alleviating, only cause עֹמֶל, molestiam (comp. on ch. xiii. 4). In ver. 3*a* Job returns their reproach of being windy, i.e. one without any purpose and substance, which they brought against him, ch. xv. 2 sq. : have windy words an end, or (וְאִם vel = אִם in a disjunctive question, Ges. § 153, 2 ; comp. § 155, 2, b) if not, what goads thee on to reply ? מִרְרָן has been already discussed on ch. vi. 25. The Targ. takes it in the sense of מַלֵּךְ : what makes it sweet to thee, etc.; the Jewish interpreters give it, without any proof, the signification, to be strong; the LXX. transl. παρενοχλήσει, which is not transparent. Hirz., Ew., Schlottm., and others, call in the help of the Arabic مَرَضَ (Aramaic מַרַע), to be sick, the IV. form of which signifies "to make sick," not "to injure."¹ We keep to the primary meaning, to pierce, penetrate; Hiph. to goad, bring out, laccessere: what incites thee, that (כִּי as ch. vi. 11, quod not quum) thou repliest again? The collective thought of what follows is not that he also, if they were in his place, could do as they have done; that he, however, would not so act (thus e.g. Blumenfeld: with reasons for comfort I would overwhelm you, and sympathizingly shake my head over you, etc.). This rendering is destroyed by the shaking of the head, which is never a gesture of pure compassion, but always of malignant joy, Sir. xii. 18; or of mockery at another's fall, Isa. xxxvii. 22; and misfortune, Ps. xxii. 8, Jer. xviii. 16, Matt. xxvii. 39. Hence Merc. considers the antithesis to begin with ver. 5, where, however, there is nothing to indicate it: minime id facerem, quin potius vos confirmarem ore meo—rather: that he also could display the same miserable consolation; he represents to them a change of their respective positions, in order that, as in a mirror, they may recognise the hatefulness of their conduct. The negative antecedent clause si essem

(with לו, according to Ges. § 155, 2, f) is surrounded by cohortatives, which (since the interrogative form of interpretation is inadmissible) signify not only loquerer, but loqui possem, or rather loqui vellem (comp. e.g. Ps. li. 18, dare vellem). When he says: I would range together, etc. (Carey: I would combine), he gives them to understand that their speeches are more artificial than natural, more declamations than the outgoings of the heart; instead of מְלִים, it is בְּמִלִּים, since the object of the action is thought of as the means, as in ver. 4 בְּמוֹ רֹאשִׁי, capite meo (for caput meum, Ps. xxii. 8), and בְּפִיהֶם, ver. 10, for פִּיהֶם, comp. Jer. xviii. 16, Lam. i. 17, Ges. § 138†; Ew. takes הַחֲבִיר by comparison of the Arabic خبر, to know (the IV. form of which, achbara, however, signifies to cause to know, announce), in a sense that belongs neither to the Heb. nor to the Arab.: to affect wisdom. In ver. 5 the chief stress is upon “with my mouth,” without the heart being there, so also on the word “my lips,” solace (נִיר ἄπ. λεγ., recalling Isa. lvii. 19, נִיב שְׁפָתַי, offspring or fruit of the lips) of my lips, i.e. dwelling only on the lips, and not coming from the heart. In אֶאֱמַעֲכֶם (Piel, not Hiph.) the Ssere is shortened to Chirek (Ges. § 60, rem. 4). According to ver. 6, כֹּאבְכֶם is to be supplied to יִחְשָׁן. He also could offer such superficial condolence without the sympathy which places itself in the condition and mood of the sufferer, and desires to afford that relief which it cannot. And yet how urgently did he need right and effectual consolation! He is not able to console himself, as the next strophe says: neither by words nor by silence is his pain assuaged.

6 If I speak, my pain is not soothed;

And if I forbear, what alleviation do I experience?

7 Nevertheless now hath He exhausted me;

Thou hast desolated all my household,

8 And Thou filledst me with wrinkles—for a witness was it,

And my leanness rose up against me

Accusing me to my face.

9 His wrath tore me, and made war upon me ;

He hath gnashed upon me with His teeth,

As mine enemy He sharpeneth His eyes against me.

וְנִסְּ stands with the cohortative in the hypothetical antecedent clause ver. 6*a*, and in 6*b* the cohortative stands alone as ch. xi. 17, Ps. lxxiii. 16, cxxxix. 8, which is more usual, and more in accordance with the meaning which the cohortative has in itself, Nägelsbach, § 89, 3. The interrogative, What goes from me? is equivalent to, what (=nothing) of pain forsakes me. The subject of the assertion which follows (ver. 7) is not the pain—Aben-Ezra thinks even that this is addressed in ver. 7*b*—still less Eliphaz, whom some think, particularly on account of the sharp expressions which follow, must be understood (vid. on the other hand, p. 133), but God, whose wrath Job regards as the cause of his suffering, and feels as the most intolerable part of it. A strained connection is obtained by taking וְנִסְּ either in an affirmative sense (Ew.: surely), as ch. xviii. 21, or in a restrictive sense: only (=entirely) He has now exhausted me (Hirz., Hahn, also Schlottm.: only I feel myself oppressed, at least to express this), by which interpretation the עֲתָה, which stands between וְנִסְּ and the verb, is in the way. We render it therefore in the adversative signification: nevertheless (verum tamen) now he seeks neither by speaking to alleviate his pain, nor by silence to control himself; God has placed him in a condition in which all his strength is exhausted. He is absolutely incapable of offering any resistance to his pain, and care has also been taken that no solacing word shall come to him from any quarter: Thou hast made all my society desolate (Carey: all my clan); עֲרֵה of the household, as in ch. xv. 34. Jerome: in nihilum redacti sunt omnes artus mei (בל אברֵי, as explained by the Jewish expositors, e.g. Ralbag), as though the human organism could be called עֲרָה. Hahn: Thou hast destroyed all my testimony, which must have been עֲרָתִי (from עִיד, whereas עֲרָה, from נָעַר, has a changeable Ssere). He means to say that he stands entirely alone, and neither sees nor hears anything consolatory, for he does not count his wife. He is therefore completely shut up to himself; God has shrivelled him up; and this suffering form to which God has reduced him, is become an evidence, i.e. for himself and for others, as the three friends, an accusation de facto, which puts him down as a sinner, although his self-consciousness testifies the opposite to him.

Ver. 8. The verb קָטַט (Aram. קָטַט), which occurs only once beside (ch. xxii. 16), has, like قَطَط (in Gecatilia's transl.), the primary meaning of binding and grasping firmly (LXX. ἐπελάβου, Symm. κατέδησας, Targ. for לָבַד, תָּמַךְ, lengthened to a quadriliteral in قَطَط, cogn. קָטַט¹), constringere, from which the significations comprehendere and corrugare have branched off; the signification, to wrinkle (make wrinkled), to shrivel up, is the most common, and the reference which follows, to his emaciation, and the lines which occur further on from the picture of one sick with elephantiasis, show that the poet here has this in his mind. Ewald's conjecture, which changes הָיָה into הָיָה, ch. vi. 2, xxx. 13 = הָיָה, as subject to ותקמטני (calamity seizes me as a witness), deprives the thought contained in לָעַר, which renders the inferential clause הָיָה לָעַר prominent, of much of its force and emphasis. In ver. 8^{bc} this thought is continued: בָּחַשׁ signifies here, according to Ps. cix. 24 (which see), a wasting away; the verb-group בָּחַשׁ, בָּחַד, בָּחַד, كَحَط, قَحَط, etc., has the primary meaning of taking away and decrease: he becomes thin from whom the fat begins to fail; to disown is equivalent to holding back recognition and admission; the metaphor, water that deceives = dries up, is similar. His wasted, emaciated appearance, since God has thus shrivelled him up, came forth against him, told him to his face, i.e. accused him not merely behind his back, but boldly and directly, as a convicted criminal. God has changed himself in relation to him into an enraged enemy. Schlottm. wrongly translates: one tears and tortures me fiercely; Raschi erroneously understands Satan by צָרִי. In general, it is the wrath of God whence Job thinks his suffering proceeds. It was the wrath of God which tore him so (like Hos. vi. 1, comp. Amos i. 11), and pursued him hostilely (as he says with the same word in ch. xxx. 21); God has gnashed against him with His teeth; God drew or sharpened (Aq., Symm., Theod., ὠξυνεν, שָׁחַטְתָּ like Ps. vii. 13) His eyes or looks like swords (Targ. as a sharp knife, אֶמְלֵל, σμίλη) for him, i.e. to pierce him through. Observe the aorr. interchanging with perff. and imperff. He describes the final calamity which has made him such a piteous form with the mark of the criminal. His present suffering is only the continuation of the decree of wrath which is gone forth concerning him.

- 10 *They have gaped against me with their mouth,
In contempt they smite my cheeks;
They conspire together against me.*
- 11 *God left me to the mercy of the ungodly,
And cast me into the hands of the evil-doer.*

He does not mean the friends by those who mock and vex him with their contemptuous words, but the men around him who envied his prosperity and now rejoice at his misfortune; those to whom his uprightness was a burden, and who now consider themselves disencumbered of their liege lord, the over-righteous, censorious, godly man. The perfects here also have not a merely present signification; he depicts his suffering according to the change it has wrought since it came upon him. The verb פָּעַר is used with the instrumental Beth instead of with the acc., as ch. xxix. 23 (comp. on במלים, ver. 4): they make an opening with their mouth (similar to Ps. xxii. 8, they make an opening with the lips, for diducunt labia). Smiting on the cheeks is in itself an insult (Lam. iii. 30); the additional בְּחִרְפָּה will therefore refer to insulting words which accompany the act. The Hithpa. הִתְמַלֵּא, which occurs only here, signifies not only to gather together to a מָלֵא in general, Isa. xxxi. 4, but (after the Arab. tamâla'a 'alâ, to conspire against any one¹) to complete one's self, to strengthen one's self (for a like hostile purpose); Reiske correctly: *sibi invicem mutuam et auxiliatricem operam contra me simul omnes ferunt.*² The meaning of עוֹל is manifest from ch. xxi. 11; from עוֹל, to sustain, alere (Arab. عال med. Wau, whence the inf. 'aul, 'uwûl, and 'ijâle), it signifies boys, knaves; and it is as unnecessary to suppose two forms, עוֹל and עוֹל, as two meanings, puer and pravus, since the language and particularly the book of Job has coined עָלַ for the latter signification: it signifies in all three passages (here and ch. xix. 18, xxi. 11) boys, or the boyish, childish, knavish. The Arabic warratta leaves no doubt as to the derivation and meaning of יָרַטְנִי; it signifies to cast down to destruction (warttah, a precipice, ruin, danger), and so here the fut. Kal יָרַטְנִי for יִירַטְנִי (Ges. § 69, rem. 3), præcipitem me dabat (LXX. ἔρριψε, Symm. ἐνέβαλε), as the præt. Kal, Num. xxii. 32: præceps = exitiosa est via. The preformative Jod has Metheg in correct texts, so that we need not suppose, with Ralbag, a רָטָה, similar in meaning to יָרַט.

¹ Wetzstein thinks the signification conspirare for יתמלאון poor in this connection, and prefers to translate: All together they eat themselves full upon me, הִתְמַלֵּא as reflexive of מָלֵא, ch. xxxviii. 39, synon. of נִשְׁבַּע, as in "the Lovers of Amâsiâ," Ferhhât, after the death of his beloved, cries out: 'We are not separated! To-morrow (i.e. soon) the All-kind One will unite us in paradise, and we shall satisfy ourselves one with another (وَنَتَمَلَّأُ مِنْ بَعْضِنَا الْبَعْضَ). One would, however, expect מִמֶּנִּי instead of עוֹל; but perhaps we may refer to the interchange of עוֹל, ch. xxii. 26, xxvii. 10, with הִתְעַנֵּן מִן, Isa. lxvi. 11.

² The signification to help, which belongs to the I. form מֵעַל, proceeds from מֵעַל, to have abundance, to be well off; prop. to be able to furnish any one with the means (opes, copias) for anything, and thereby to place him in a position to accomplish it. Comp. the Lat. ops, opem ferre, pitulari, opes, opulentus (مولى).—FL.

12 I was at ease, but He hath broken me in pieces;

*And He hath taken me by the neck and shaken me to pieces,
And set me up for a mark for himself.*

13 His arrows whistled about me;

*He pierced my reins without sparing;
He poured out my gall upon the ground.*

14 He brake through me breach upon breach,

He ran upon me like a mighty warrior.

He was prosperous and contented, when all at once God began to be enraged against him; the intensive form פָּרַפַּר (Arab. farfara) signifies to break up entirely, crush, crumble in pieces (Hithpo. to become fragile, Isa. xxiv. 19); the corresponding intensive form פָּצַצַּן (from פָּצַץ, Arab. نَض, cogn. נָפַץ), to beat in pieces (Polel of a hammer, Jer. xxiii. 29), to dash to pieces: taking him by the neck, God raised him on high in order to dash him to the ground with all His might. מִטָּרֶה (from נָטַר, τηρεῖν, like σκοπός from σκέπτεσθαι) is the target, as in the similar passage, Lam. iii. 12, distinct from מִפְּנֵעַ, ch. vii. 20, object of attack and point of attack: God has set me up for a target for himself, in order as it were to try what He and His arrows can do. Accordingly רָפִי (from רָבַב = רָבָה, רָמָה, jacere) signifies not: His archers

(although this figure would be admissible after ch. x. 17, xix. 12, and the form after the analogy of רב, רע, etc., is naturally taken as a substantival adj.), but, especially since God appears directly as the actor: His arrows (= חֲצִי, ch. vi. 4), from רב, formed after the analogy of בּוֹ, מִס, etc., according to which it is translated by LXX., Targ., Jer., while most of the Jewish expositors, referring to Jer. l. 29 (where we need not, with Böttch., point רִבִּים, and here רִבִּי), interpret by מוֹרֵי הַחֲצִים. On all sides, whichever way he might turn himself, the arrows of God flew about him, mercilessly piercing his reins, so that his gall-bladder emptied itself outwards (comp. Lam. ii. 11, and vid. Psychol. p. 316). It is difficult to conceive what is here said;¹ it is, moreover, not meant to be understood strictly according to the sense: the divine arrows, which are only an image for divinely decreed sufferings, pressed into his inward parts, and wounded the noblest organs of his nature. In ver. 14 follows another figure. He was as a wall which was again and again broken through by the missiles or battering-rams of God, and against which He ran after the manner of besiegers when storming. פָּרֵץ is the proper word for such breaches and holes in a wall generally; here it is connected as obj. with its own verb, according to Ges. § 138, rem. 1. The second פָּרֵץ (פָּרֵץ with Kametz) has Ssade minusculum, for some reason unknown to us.

The next strophe says what change took place in his own conduct in consequence of this incomprehensible wrathful disposition of God which had vented itself on him.

¹ The emptying of the gall takes place if the gall-bladder or any of its ducts are torn; but how the gall itself (without assuming some morbid condition) can flow outwardly, even with a severe wound, is a difficult question, with which only those who have no appreciation of the standpoint of imagery and poetry will distress themselves. [On the "spilling of the gall" or "bursting of the gall-bladder" among the Arabs, as the working of violent and painful emotions, vid. Zeitschr. der deutschen morgenländ. Gesellsch. Bd. xvi. S. 586, Z. 16 ff.—FL.]

- 15 *I sewed sackcloth upon my skin,
And defiled my horn with dust.*
- 16 *My face is exceeding red with weeping,
And on mine eyelids is the shadow of death,*
- 17 *Although there is no wrong in my hand,
And my prayer is pure.*

Coarse-haired cloth is the recognised clothing which the deeply sorrowful puts on, ἱμάτιον στενοχωρίας καὶ πένθους, as the Greek expositors remark. Job does not say of it that he put it on or slung it round him; but that he sewed it upon his naked body; and this is to be attributed to the hideous distortion of the body by elephantiasis, which will not admit of the use of the ordinary form of clothes. For the same reason he also uses, not עֹרִי, but גִּלְדִּי, which signifies either the scurfy scaly surface (as גִּלְדִּי and הַגִּלְדִּי in Talmudic of the scab of a healing wound, but also occurring e.g. of the bedaggled edge of clothes when it has become dry), or scornfully describes the skin as already almost dead; for the healthy skin is called עֹר, גִּלְדִּי, on the other hand, βύρσα (LXX.), hide (esp. when removed from the body), Talm. e.g. sole-leather. We prefer the former interpretation (adopted by Raschi and others): The crust in which the terrible lepra has clothed his skin (vid. on ch. vii. 5, xxx. 18, 19, 30) is intended. עָלַתִּי in ver. 15b is referred by Rosenm., Hirz., Ges., and others (as indeed by Saad. and Gecat., who transl. “I digged into”), to עָלָה (עָלָה), to enter, penetrate: “I stuck my horn in the dust;”

but this signification of the Hebrew עָלָה is unknown, it signifies rather to inflict pain, or scorn (e.g. Lam. iii. 51, mine eye causeth pain to my soul), generally with לְ, here with the accusative: I have misused, i.e. injured or defiled (as the Jewish expositors explain), my horn with dust. This is not equivalent to my head (as in the Syr. version), but he calls everything that was hitherto his power and pride קָרָנִי (LXX., Targ.); all this he has together at the same time injured, i.e. represented as come to destruction, by covering his head with dust and ashes.

Ver. 16*a*. The construction of the Chethib is like 1 Sam. iv. 15, of the Keri on the other hand like Lam. i. 20, ii. 11 (where the same is said of מַעֵי, viscera mea); קָמַרְמַר is a passive intensive form (Ges. § 55, 3), not in the signification: they are completely kindled (LXX. συγκέκτανται, Jer. intumuit, from the קָמַר, خمر, which signifies to ferment), but: they are red all over (from קָמַר, حمر, whence the Alhambra, as a red building, takes its name), reddened; i.e. from weeping; and this has so weakened them, that the shadow of death (vid. on ch. x. 21 sq.) seems to rest upon his eyelids; they are therefore sad even to the deepest gloom. Thus exceedingly miserable is his state and appearance, although he is no discovered hypocrite, who might need to do penance in sackcloth and ashes, and shed tears of penitence without any solace. Hirz. explains על as a preposition: by the absence of evil in my hands; but ver. 17*a* and 17*b* are substantival clauses, and על is therefore just like Isa. liii. 9, a conjunction (= על-אשר). His hands are clean from wrong-doing, free from violence and oppression; his prayer is pure, pura; as Merc. observes, ex puritate cordis et fidei. From the feeling of the strong contrast between his piety and his being stigmatized as an evil-doer by such terrible suffering,—from this extreme contrast which has risen now to its highest in his consciousness of patient endurance of suffering, the lofty thoughts of the next strophe take their rise.

- 18 *Oh earth, cover thou not my blood,
And let my cry find no resting-place! !—*
19 *Even now behold in heaven is my Witness,
And One who acknowledgeth me is in the heights!*

- 20 *Though the mockers of me are my friends—
To Eloah mine eyes pour forth tears,*
21 *That He may decide for man against Eloah,
And for the son of man against his friend.*
22 *For the years that may be numbered are coming on,
And I shall go a way without return.*

Blood that is not covered up cries for vengeance, Ezek. xxiv. 7 sq.; so also blood still unavenged is laid bare that it may find vengeance, Isa. xxvi. 21. According to this idea, in the lofty consciousness of his innocence, Job calls upon the earth not to suck in his blood as of one innocently slain, but to let it lie bare, thereby showing that it must be first of all avenged ere the earth can take it up;¹ and for his cry, i.e. the cry (עֲקָרָהּ) to be explained according to Gen. iv. 10) proceeding from his blood as from his poured-out soul, he desires that it may urge its way unhindered and unstilled towards heaven without finding a place of rest (Symm. στάσις). Therefore, in the very God who appears to him to be a blood-thirsty enemy in pursuit of him, Job nevertheless hopes to find a witness of his innocence: He will acknowledge his blood, like that of Abel, to be the blood of an innocent man. It is an inward irresistible demand made by his faith which here brings together two opposite principles—principles which the understanding cannot unite—with bewildering boldness. Job believes that God will even finally avenge the blood which His wrath has shed, as blood that has been innocently shed. This faith, which sends forth beyond death itself the word of absolute command contained in ver. 18, in ver. 19 brightens and becomes a certain confidence, which draws from the future

into the present that acknowledgment which God afterwards makes of him as innocent. The thought of what is unmerited in that decree of wrath which delivers him over to death, is here forced into the background, and in the front stands only the thought of the exaltation of the God in heaven above human short-sightedness, and the thought that no one else but He is the final refuge of the oppressed: even now (i.e. this side of death)¹ behold in heaven is my witness (הִנֵּה an expression of the actus directus fidei) and my confessor (שֹׁהֵר a poetic Aramaism, similar in meaning to עֵר, LXX. ὁ συνιστωρ μου) in the heights. To whom should he flee from the mockery of his friends, who consider his appeal to the testimony of his conscience as the stratagem of a hypocrite! מִלִּי from הִלִּי, Ps. cxix. 51, my mockers, i.e. those mocking me, lascivientes in me (vid. Gesch. der jüd. Poesie, S. 200). The short clause, ver. 20a, is, logically at least, like a disjunctive clause with כִּי or גַּם-כִּי, Ewald, § 362, b: if his friends mock him—to Eloah, who is after all the best of friends, his eyes pour forth tears (דָּלְדָּלָה stillat, comp. דָּל of languishing, Isa. xxxviii. 14), that He may decide (וַיֹּכֵחַ voluntative in a final signification, as ch. ix. 33) for man (לְ here, as Isa. xi. 4, ii. 4, of the client) against (עַם, as Ps. lv. 19, xciv. 16, of an opponent) Eloah, and for the son of man (לְ to be supplied here in a similar sense to ver. 21a, comp. ch. xv. 3) in relation to (לְ as it is used in לְ . . . בֵּין, e.g. Ezek. xxxiv. 22) his friend. Job longs and hopes for two things from God: (1) that He would finally decide in favour of גַּבַּר, i.e. just himself, the patient sufferer, in opposition to God, that therefore God would acknowledge that Job is not a criminal, nor his suffering a merited punishment; (2) that He would decide in favour of

Olsh. approves Ewald's translation: "That He allows man to be in the right rather than God, and that He judges man against his friend;" but granted even that הוֹכִיחַ, like שָׁפַט followed by an acc., may be used in the signification: to grant any one to be in the right (although, with such a construction, it everywhere signifies ἐλέγχειν), this rendering would still not commend itself, on account of the specific gravity of the hope which is here struggling through the darkness of conflict. Job appeals from God to God; he hopes that truth and love will finally decide against wrath. The meaning of הוֹכִיחַ has reference to the duty of an arbitrator, as in ch. ix. 33. Schlottm. aptly recalls the saying of the philosophers, which applies here in a different sense from that in which it is meant, nemo contra Deum, nisi Deus ipse. In ver. 22 Job now establishes the fact that the heavenly witness will not allow him to die a death that he and others would regard as the death of a sinner, from the brevity of the term of life yet granted him, and the hopelessness of man when he is once dead. שְׁנוֹת מִסְפָּר are years of number = few years (LXX. ἔτη ἀριθμητά); comp. the position of the words as they are to be differently understood, ch. xv. 20. On the inflexion jeethāju, vid. on ch. xii. 6. Jerome transl. transeunt, but אַתָּה cannot signify this in any Semitic dialect. But even that Job (though certainly the course of elephantiasis can continue for years) is intended to refer to the prospect of some, although few, years of life (Hirz. and others: the few years which I can still look forward to, are drawing on), does not altogether suit the tragic picture. The approach of the years that can be numbered is rather thought of as the approach of their end; and the few years are not those which still remain, but in general the but short span of life allotted to him (Hahn). The arrangement of the words in ver. 22b also agrees with this, as not having the form of a conclusion (then shall I go, etc.), but that of an independent co-ordinate clause: and a path, there (whence) I come not back (an attributive relative clause according to Ges. § 123, 3, b) I shall go (אֵלֶּיךָ poetic, and in order to gain a rhythmical fall at the close, for אֵלַי). Now follow, in the next strophe, short ejaculatory clauses: as Oetinger observes, Job chants his own requiem while living.

Ch. xvii. 1 My breath is corrupt,

My days are extinct,

The graves are ready for me.

2 Truly mockery surrounds me,

And mine eye shall loiter over their disputings.

Hirz., Hlgst., and others, wrongly consider the division of the chapter here to be incorrect. The thought in ch. xvi. 22 is really a concluding thought, like ch. x. 20 sqq., vii. 21. Then in ch. xvii. 1 another strain is taken up; and as ch. xvi. 22 is related, as a confirmation, to the request expressed in xvi. 19–21, so xvii. 1, 2 are related to that expressed in xvii. 3. The connection with the conclusion of ch. xvi. is none the less close: the thoughts move on somewhat crosswise (chiastisch). We do not translate with Ewald: “My spirit is destroyed,” because לִבִּי (here and Isa. x. 27) signifies not, to be destroyed, but, to be corrupted, disturbed, troubled; not the spirit (after خبل, usually of disturbance of spirit), but the breath is generally meant, which is become short (ch. vii. 15) and offensive (ch. xix. 17), announcing suffocation and decay as no longer far distant. In ver. 1*b* the ἄπ. γερ. נָעָכִי is equivalent to נָרַעְכִי, found elsewhere. In ver. 1*c* קָבְרִים is used as if the dead were called, Arab. ssâchib el-kubûr, grave-companions. He is indeed one who is dying, from whom the grave is but a step distant, and still the friends promise him long life if he will only repent! This is the mockery which is with him, i.e. surrounds him, as he affirms, ver. 2*a*. A secondary verb, הָתַל, is formed from the Hiph. הִתַּל (of which we had the non-syncopated form of the fut. in ch. xiii. 9), the Piel of which occurs in 1 Kings xviii. 27 of Elijah's derision of the priests of Baal, and from this is formed the pluralet. הִתְּלִים (or, according to another reading, הָתַלִּים, with the same doubling of the ל as in מְהַתְּלוֹת, deceitful things, Isa. xxx. 10; comp. the same thing in ch. xxxiii. 7, אֲרָאֵם, their lions of God = heroes), which has the meaning foolery,—a meaning questioned by Hirz. without right,—in which the idea of deceit and mockery are united. Gecatilia and Ralbag take it as a part.: mockers; Stick., Wolfson, Hahn: deluded; but the analogy of שַׁעֲשְׁעִים, תַּעֲלָלוֹת, and the like, speaks in favour of taking it as a substantive. אִם-לֹא is affirmative (Ges. § 155, 2, f). Ewald renders it as expressive of desire: if only not (Hlgst.: dummodo ne); but this signification (Ew. § 329, b) cannot be supported. On the other hand, it might be intended interrogatively (as ch. xxx. 25): annon illusiones mecum (Rosenm.); but this אִם-לֹא, corresponding to the second member of a disjunctive question, has no right connection in the preceding. We therefore prefer the affirmative meaning, and explain it like ch. i. 11, ii. 5, xxii. 20, xxxi. 36. Truly what he continually hears, i.e. from the side of the friends, is only false and delusive utterances, which consequently sound to him like jesting and mockery. The suff. in ver. 2*b* refers to them. הִמָּרוֹת (with Dag. dirimens, which renders the sound of the word more pathetic, as ch. ix. 18, Joel i. 17, and in the Hiph. form בְּנִלְתָּךְ, Isa. xxxiii. 1), elsewhere generally (Josh. i. 18 only excepted) of rebellion against God, denotes here the contradictory, quarrelsome bearing of the friends, not the dispute in itself (comp. מָרָה, III. to attack, VI. to contend with another), but coming forward controversially; only to this is הִלֵּין עֵינַי suitable. הִלֵּין must not be taken as = הִלִּין here; Ewald's translation, "only let not mine eye come against their irritation," forces upon this verb, which always signifies to murmur, γογγύζειν, a meaning foreign to it, and one that does not well suit it here. The voluntative form הִלֵּין = הִלֵּין (here not the pausal form, as Judg. xix. 20, comp. 2 Sam. xvii. 16) quite accords with the sense: mine eye shall linger on their janglings; it shall not look on anything that is cheering, but be held fast by this cheerless spectacle, which increases his bodily suffering and his inward pain. From these comforters, who are become his adversaries, Job turns in supplication to God.

3 *Lay down now, be bondsman for me with Thyself;
Who else should furnish surety to me?!*

4 For Thou hast closed their heart from understanding, Therefore wilt Thou not give superiority to them.

5 *He who giveth his friends for spoil,
The eyes of his children shall languish.*

It is unnecessary, with Reiske and Olsh., to read עֲרַבְנִי (pone quæso arrhabonem meum = pro me) in order that שִׁמָּה may not stand without an object; שִׁמָּה has this meaning included in it, and the עֲרַבְנִי which follows shows that neither לִבִּי (Rabag) nor יָדִי (Carey) is to be supplied; accordingly שִׁים here, like (وَضَعَ), and in the classics both τίθεναι and ponere, signifies alone, the laying down of a pledge. Treated by the friends as a criminal justly undergoing punishment, he seeks his refuge in God, who has set the mark of a horrible disease upon him contrary to his desert, as though he were guilty, and implores Him to confirm the reality of his innocence in some way or other by laying down a pledge for him (ὑποθήκη). The further prayer is עֲרִבֵנִי, a word of entreaty which occurs also in Hezekiah's psalm, Isa. xxxviii. 14, and Ps. cxix. 122; עֲרִב seq. acc. signifies, as noted on the latter passage, to furnish surety for any one, and gen. to take the place of a mediator (comp. also on Heb. vii. 22, where ἑγγυος is a synon. of μεσολαβης). Here, however, the significant עֲרִיב is added: furnish security for me with Thyself; elsewhere the form is לְ עֲרִיב, to furnish security for (Prov. vi. 1), or לְפָנַי before, any one, here with עִמִּי of the person by whom the security is to be accepted. The thought already expressed in ch. xvi. 21a receives a still stronger expression here: God is conceived of as two persons, on the one side as a judge who treats Job as one deserving of punishment, on the other side as a bondsman who pledges himself for the innocence of the sufferer before the judge, and stands as it were as surety against the future. In the question, ver. 3b, the representation is again somewhat changed: Job appears here as the one to whom surety is given. נִתְקַע, described by expositors as reciprocal, is rather reflexive: to give one's hand (the only instance of the med. form of נִתְקַע פֶּה) = to give surety by striking hands, dextera data sponsionem in se recipere (Hlgst.). And לִי יְדִי is not to be explained after the analogy of the passive, as the usual לְ of the agent: who would allow himself to be struck by my hand, i.e. who would accept the surety from me (Wolfson), which is unnatural both in representation and expression; but it is, according to Prov. vi. 1 (vid. Bertheau), intended of the hand of him who receives the stroke of the hand of him who gives the pledge. This is therefore the meaning of the question: who else (כִּי הוּא as iv. 7), if not God himself, should strike (his hand) to my hand, i.e. should furnish to me a pledge (viz. of my innocence) by joining hands? There is none but God alone who can intercede for him, as a guarantee of his innocence before himself and others. This negative answer: None but Thou alone, is established in ver. 4. God has closed the heart of the friends against understanding, prop. concealed, i.e. He has fixed a curtain, a wall of partition, between their hearts and the right understanding of the matter; He has smitten them with blindness, therefore He will not (since they are suffering from a want of perception which He has ordained, and which is consequently known to Him) allow them to be exalted, i.e. to conquer and triumph. "The exaltation of the friends," observes Hirzel rightly, "would be, that God should openly justify their assertion of Job's guilt." Löwenthal translates: therefore art thou not honoured; but it is not pointed תְּהַרְמֶם = תְּתַרְמֶם, but תְּהַרְמֶם, whether it be that אֲתָם is to be supplied, or that it is equivalent to תְּהַרְמֶם (Ew. § 62, a, who, however, prefers to take it as n. Hithpa. like תְּקַמֶם in the unimproved signification: improvement, since he maintains this affords no right idea), according to the analogy of similar verb-forms (ch. xxxi. 15, Isa. lxiv. 6), by a resolving of the two similar consonants which occur together.

The hope thus expressed Job establishes (ver. 5) by a principle from general experience, that he who offers his friends as spoil for distribution will be punished most severely for the same upon his children: he shall not escape the divine retribution which visits him, upon his own children, for the wrong done to his friends. Almost all modern expositors are agreed in this rendering of לְחֶלֶק as regards ver. 5*a*; but חֶלֶק must not be translated "lot" (Ewald), which it never means; it signifies a share of spoil, as e.g. Num. xxxi. 36 (Jerome prædam), or even with a verbal force: plundering (from חָלַק, 2 Chron. xxviii. 21), or even in antithesis to entering into bond for a friend with all that one possesses (Stick., Schlottm.), a dividing (of one's property) = distraining, as a result of the surrender to the creditor, to which the verb הָנִיד is appropriate, which would then denote denouncing before a court of justice, as Jer. xx. 10, not merely proclaiming openly, as Isa. iii. 9. We have translated "spoil," which admits of all these modifications and excludes none; the general meaning is certainly: one deserts (instead of shielding as an intercessor) his friends and delivers them up; הָנִיד with a general subj., as ch. iv. 2 (if any one attempts), xv. 3, xxvii. 23. With respect to the other half of the verse, 5b, the optative rendering: may they languish (Vaih.), to the adoption of which the old expositors have been misled by parallels like Ps. cix. 9 sq., is to be rejected; it is contrary to the character of Job (ch. xxxi. 30). We agree with Mercerus: Nequaquam hoc per imprecationem, sed ut consequentis justissimæ pœnæ denunciationem ab Iobo dictum putamus. For ver. 5b is also not to be taken as a circumstantial clause: even if the eyes of his children languish (Ew., Hlgst., Stick., Hahn, Schl.). It is not רָעוּהוּ, but רָעִים; and before supposing here a Synallage num. so liable to be misunderstood, one must try to get over the difficulty without it, which is here easy enough. Hence Job is made, in the intended application of the general principle, to allude to his own children, and Ewald really considers him the father of infant children, which, however, as may be seen from the prologue, is nothing but an invention unsupported by the history. Since it is בָּנָי and not בְּנֵיהֶם, we refer the suff. to the subj. of הָנִיד. The Waw of וַיְיָ Mich. calls Waw consecutivum; it, however, rather combines things that are inseparable (certainly as cause and effect, sin and punishment). And it is הָנִיד, not הָנִיד, because the perf. would describe the fact as past, while the fut. places us in the midst of this faithless conduct. Job says God cannot possibly allow these, his three friends, the upper hand. One proclaims his friends as spoil (comp. ch. vi. 27), and the eyes of his children languish (comp. ch. xi. 20), i.e. he who so faithlessly disowns the claims of affection, is punished for it on that which he holds most dear. But this uncharitableness which he experiences is also a visitation of God. In the next strophe he refers all that he meets with from man to Him as the final cause, but not without a presage of the purpose for which it is designed.

- 6 *And He hath made me a proverb to the world,
And I became as one in whose face they spit.*
- 7 *Then mine eye became dim with grief,
And all my members were like a shadow.*
- 8 *The upright were astonished at it,
And the innocent is stirred up over the godless ;*
- 9 *Nevertheless the righteous holdeth fast on his way,
And he that hath clean hands waxeth stronger and stronger.*

Without a question, the subj. of ver. 6a is God. It is the same thing whether לִשְׁמִי is taken as inf. followed by the subject in the nominative (Ges. § 133, 2), or as a subst. (LXX. θρύλλημα; Aq., Symm., Theod., παραβολήν), like רִחֵץ, ch. xii. 4, followed by the gen. subjectivus. לִשְׁמִי is the usual word for ridicule, expressed in parables of a satirical character, e.g. Joel ii. 17 (according to which, if לִשְׁמִי were intended as inf., לִשְׁמִי-לְבַי עַמִּים might have been expected); עַמִּים signifies both nations and races, and tribes or people, i.e. members of this and that nation, or in gen. of mankind (ch. xii. 2). We have intentionally chosen an ambiguous expression in the translation, for what Job says can be meant of a wide range of people (comp. on ch. ii. 11 ad fin.), as well as of those in the immediate neighbourhood; the friends themselves represent different tribes; and a perishable gipsy-like troglodyte race, to whom Job is become a derision, is specially described further on (ch. xxiv. xxx.).

Ver. 6b. By תַּפַּח (translated by Jer. exemplum, and consequently mistaken for מוֹפֵת) the older expositors are reminded of the name of the place where the sacrifices were offered to Moloch in the valley of the sons of Hinnom (whence גִּיהֶנֶם, γέεννα, hell), since they explain it by "the fire of hell," but only from want of a right perception; the לִפְנֵים standing with it, which nowhere signifies palam, and cannot here (where אֵהִיה, although in the signification ἐγενόμην, follows) signify a multo tempore, shows that תַּפַּח here is to be derived from תָּוַף, to spit out (as נִפַּח, gum, from נוּף). This verb certainly cannot be supported in Hebr. and Aram. (since רָקַק is the commoner word), except by two passages in the Talmud (Nidda 42a, comp. Sabbath 99b, and Chethuboth 61b); but it is confirmed by the Æthiopic and Coptic and an onomatopoetic origin, as the words πτύειν, ψύειν, spuere, Germ. speien, etc., show.¹ Cognate is the Arabic taffafa, to treat with contempt, and the interjection tuffan, fie upon thee,² e.g. in the proverb (quoted by Umbreit): 'aini fihi watuffan 'aleihi, my eye rests on it wishfully, and yet I feel disgust at it. Therefore לִפְנֵים (spitting upon the face) is equivalent to בַּפִּי, Num. xii. 14, Deut. xxv. 9 (to spit in the face). In consequence of this deep debasement of the object of scorn and spitting, the brightness and vision of his eye (sense of sight) are become dim (comp. Ps. vi. 8, xxxi. 10) מִכַּעַשׁ (always written with שׁ, not ס, in the book of Job), from grief, and his frames, i.e. bodily frame = members (Jer. membra, Targ. incorrectly: features), are become like a shadow all of them, as fleshless and powerless as a shadow, which is only appearance without substance.

² Almost all modern expositors repeat the remark here, that this tuffan is similar in meaning to παρά, Matt. v. 22, while they might learn from Lightfoot that παρά has nothing to do with רָק, to spit, but is equivalent to רִיקָא, געטע.

His suffering, his miserable form (זאת), is of such a kind that the upright are astonished (שָׁמַם, to become desolate, silent), and the guiltless (like himself and other innocent sufferers) become excited (here with vexation as in Ps. xxxvii. 1, as in ch. xxxi. 29 with joy) over the godless (who is none the less prosperous); but the righteous holds firm (without allowing himself to be disconcerted by this anomalous condition of things, though impenetrably mysterious) on his way (the way of good to which he has pledged himself), and the pure of hands (יָמָיו as Prov. xxii. 11, according to another mode of writing יָמָיו with Chateph-Kametz under the ו and Gaja under the י; comp. Isa. liv. 9, where the form of writing יִמִּיגּוֹר umigg^oor is well authorized) increases (יָסַף, of inward increase, as Eccles. i. 18) in strength (אִמּוֹ only here in the book of Job); i.e. far from allowing suffering to draw him from God to the side of the godless, he gathers strength thereby only still more perseveringly to pursue righteousness of life and purity of conduct, since suffering, especially in connection with such experiences as Job now has with the three friends, drives him to God and makes his communion with Him closer and firmer. These words of Job (if we may be allowed the figure) are like a rocket which shoots above the tragic darkness of the book, lighting it up suddenly, although only for a short time. The confession which breaks through in lyric form in Ps. lxxiii. here finds expression of a more brief, sententious kind. The point of Eliphaz' reproach (ch. xv. 4), that Job makes void the fear of God, and depreciates communion with God, is destroyed by this confession, and the assurance of Satan (ch. ii. 5) is confronted by a fact of experience, which, if it should also become manifest in the case of Job, utterly puts to shame and makes void the hope of the evil spirit.

10 But only come again all of you!

I shall not find a wise man among you.—

- 11 *My days are past,
My purposes cut off,
The cherished thoughts of my heart.—*
- 12 They explain night as day, Light is near when darkness sets in.

The truly righteous man, even if in the midst of his affliction he should see destruction before him, does not however forsake God. But (nevertheless) ye—he exclaims to the friends, who promise him a long and prosperous life if he will only humble himself as a sinner who is receiving punishment—repeat again and again your hortatory words on penitence! a wise man who might be able to see into my real condition, I shall not find among you. He means that they deceive themselves concerning the actual state of the case before them; for in reality he is meeting death without being deceived, or allowing himself to be deceived, about the matter. His appeal is similar to ch. vi. 29. Carey translates correctly: Attack me again with another round of arguments, etc. Instead of וְאֵלֶם, as it is written everywhere else (generally when the speech is drawing to a close), we find וְאֵלֶם (as the form of writing אֵלֶם, אֵלֶם occurs also in the subst. אֵלֶם), perh. in order to harmonize with בְּלֵם, which is here according to rule instead of בְּלֵם, which corresponds more to our form of a vocative clause, just as in 1 Kings xxii. 28, Mic. i. 2 (Ewald, § 327, a).¹ In חֲשִׁבוּ וְבִאוּ the jussive and imper. (for the Chethib יִבֹּאוּ, which occurs in some Codd. and editions, is meaningless) are united, the former being occasioned by the arrangement of the words, which is unfavourable to the imper. (comp. Ew. § 229); moreover, the first verb gives the adverbial notion iterum, denuo to the second, according to Ges. § 142, 3, a.

What follows, ver. 11, is the confirmation of the fact that there is no wise man among them who might be able to give him efficient solace by a right estimate of the magnitude and undeservedness of his suffering. His life is indeed run out; and the most cherished plans and hopes which he had hedged in and fostered for the future in his heart, he has utterly and long since given up. The plur. (occurring only here) of זַמָּה, which occurs also sensu malo, signifies projects, as מְזֻמּוֹת, ch. xxi. 27, xlii. 2, from זָמַם, to tie; Aben-Ezra refers to the Arab. zamâm (a thread, band, esp. a rein). These plans which are now become useless, these cherished thoughts, he calls מְזֻמָּי, peculia (from יָרַשׁ, to take possession of) of his heart. Thus, after Obad. ver. 17, Gecatilia (in Aben-Ezra) also explains, while, according to Ewald, Beiträge, S. 98, he understands the heart-strings, i.e. the trunks of the arteries (for thus is נִיָּאָ to be explained), and consequently, as Ewald himself, and even Farisol, most improbably combines מְזֻמָּי with מוֹתָר (יִתָּר). Similarly the LXX. τὰ ἄρθρα τῆς καρδίας, as though the joints (instead of the valves) of the heart were intended; probably with Middeldorpf, after the Syriac Hexapla, ἄκρα is to be read instead of ἄρθρα; this, however, rests upon a mistaking of מְזֻמָּי for ראשי. While he is now almost dead, and his life-plans of the future are torn away (נִתְקָו), the friends turn night into day (שִׁים, as Isa. v. 20); light is (i.e. according to their opinion) nearer than the face of darkness, i.e. than the darkness which is in reality turned to him, and which is as though it stared at him from the immediate future. Thus Nolde explains it as comparative, but connecting ver. 12b with יְשִׁמוּ, and considering פָּנִי (which is impossible by this compar. rendering) as meaningless: lucem magis propinquam quam tenebras. It is however possible that מִפְּנֵי is used the same as in ch. xxiii. 17: light is, as they think, near before darkness, i.e. while darkness sets in (ingruentibus tenebris), according to which we have translated. If we understand ver. 12*b* from Job's standpoint, and not from that of the friends, קרוב מן is to be explained according to the Arab. قريب من, prope abest ab, as the LXX. even translates: φῶς ἐγγὺς ἀπὸ προσώπου σκότους, which Olympiodorus interprets by οὐ μακρὰν σκότους. But by this rendering פני makes the expression, which really needs investigation, only still lamer. Renderings, however, like Renan's Ah! votre lumière ressemble aux ténèbres, are removed from all criticism. The subjective rendering, by which ver. 12*b* is under the government of ישמו, is after all the most natural. That he has darkness before him, while the friends present to him the approach of light on condition of penitence, is the thought that is developed in the next strophe.

- 13 *If I hope, it is for Sheôl as my house,
In darkness I make my bed.*
14 *I cry to corruption: Thou art my father!—
To the worm: Thou art my mother and sister!*
15 *Where now therefore is my hope?
And my hope, who seeth it?*
16 *To the bars of Sheôl it descends,
When at the same time there is rest in the dust.*

All modern expositors transl.: If I hope (wait) for Sheôl as my house, etc., since they regard vers. 13 sq. as a hypothetical antecedent clause to ver. 15, consisting of four members, where the conclusion should begin with וְאִם, and should be indicated by Waw apodosis. There is no objection to this explanation so far as the syntax is concerned, but there will then be weighty thoughts which are also expressed in the form of fresh thoughts, for which independent clauses seem more appropriate, under the government of וְאִם, as if they were presuppositions. The transition from the preceding strophe to this becomes also easier, if we take vers. 13 sq. as independent clauses from which, in ver. 15, an inference is drawn, with Waw indicative of the train of thought (Ew. § 348). Accordingly, we regard אִם-אָקוּה in ver. 13 as antecedent (denoted by Dechî, i.e. Tiphcha antèrius, just as Ps. cxxxix. 8a) and שְׂאוֹל בֵּיתִי as conclusion; the Waw apod. is wanting, as e.g. ch. ix. 27 sq., and the structure of the sentence is similar to ch. ix. 19. If I hope, says Job, "Sheôl is my house" = this is the substance of my hope, that Sheôl will be my house. In darkness he has (i.e. in his consciousness, which anticipates that which is before him as near and inevitable) fixed his resting-place (poet. strata, as Ps. cxxxii. 3). To corruption and the worm he already cries, father! and, mother! sister! It is, as it seems, that bold figure which is indicated in the Job-like Ps. lxxxviii. 19 ("my acquaintances are the realms of darkness"), which is here (comp. ch. xxx. 29) worked out; and, differently applied, perhaps Prov. vii. 4 echoes it. Since the fem. רַפָּה is used as the object addressed by אֲנִי and אַחֹתִי, which is besides, on account of its always collective meaning (in distinction from תּוֹלַעַת), well suited for this double apostrophe, we may assume that the poet will have used a masc. object for אֲנִי; and there is really no reason against שְׂחַת here being, with Ramban, Rosenm., Schlottm., Böttcher (de inferis, § 179), derived not from שָׁחַת (as נָחַת, ver. 16b, from נוּחַ), but from שָׁחַת (as נָחַת, Isa. xxx. 30, from נָחַת), especially since the old versions transl. שְׂחַת also elsewhere διαφθορά (putredo), and thereby prove that both derivations accord with the structure of the language. Thus, now already conscious of his belonging to corruption and the worm as by the closest ties of relationship, he asks: Itaque ubi tandem spes mea?

The accentuation connects אֲנִי to the following word, instead of uniting it with אִיָּה, just as in Isa. xix. 12; Luzzattc (on Isa. xix. 12) considers this as a mistake in the Codd., and certainly the accentuation Judg. ix. 38 (אִיָּה Kadma, אֲנִיָּה Mercha) is not according to our model, and even in this passage another arrangement of the accents is found, e.g. in the edition of Brescia.¹ No other hope, in Job's opinion, but speedy death is before him; no human eye is capable of seeing, i.e. of discovering (so e.g. Hahn), any other hope than just this. Somewhat differently Hirz. and others: and my hope, viz. of my recovery, who will it see in process of fulfilment? Certainly תקותי is in both instances equivalent to a hope which he dared to harbour; and the meaning is, that beside the one hope which he has, and which is a hope only per antiphrasim, there is no room for another hope; there is none such (ver. 15a), and no one will attain a sight of such, be it visible in the distance or experienced as near at hand (ver. 15b). The subj. of ver. 16a is not the hope of recovery which the friends present to him (so e.g. Ew.), but his only real hope: this, avoiding human ken, descends to the lower world, for it is the hope of death, and consequently the death of hope. בָּרִי signifies bars, bolts, which Hahn denies, although he says himself that בָּרִים signifies beams of wood among other things; "bolts" is not here intended to imply such as are now used in locks, but the cross bars and beams of wood of any size that serve as a fastening to a door; vectis in exactly the same manner combines the meanings, a carrying-pole and a bar, in which signification בָּר is the synon. of בָּרִית.² The meanings assigned to the word, wastes (Schnurrer and others), bounds (Hahn), clefts (Böttch.), and the like, are fanciful and superfluous. On תִּרְדְּנָה, instead of תִּרְדֵּי, vid. Caspari on Obad. ver. 13, Ges. § 47, rem. 3. It is sing., not plur.

¹ This accentuates וַאֲיָה with Munach, אָפֹו with Munach, which accords with the matter, instead of which, according to Luzz., since the Athnach-word תקותי consists of three syllables, it should be more correctly accented וַאֲיָה with Munach, אָפֹו with Dechi. Both, also Munach Munach, are admissible; vid. Bär, Thorath Emeth, S. 43, § 7, comp. S. 71, not.

(Böttch.), for ver. 15 does not speak of two hopes, not even if, as it seems according to the ancient versions, another word of cognate meaning had stood in the place of the second חקוה originally. His hope goes down to the regions of the dead, when altogether there is rest in the dust. This “together, יחד,” Hahn explains: to me and it, to this hope; but that would be pursuing the figure to an inadmissible length, extending far beyond ch. xx. 11, and must then be expressed לפני יחד. Others (e.g. Hirz., Ew.) explain: when at the same time, i.e. simultaneously with this descent of my hope, there is rest to me in the dust. Considering the use of יחד in itself, it might be explained: when altogether [entirely] there is rest in the dust; but this meaning integer, totus quantus, the word has elsewhere always in connection with a subj. or obj. to which it is referable, e.g. ch. x. 8, Ps. xxxiii. 15; and, moreover, it may be rendered also in the like passages by “all together,” as ch. iii. 18, xxi. 26, xl. 13, instead of “altogether, entirely.” Since, on the other hand, the signification “at the same time” can at least with probability be supported by Ps. cxli. 10, and since וְיַחַד, which is certainly used temporally, brings cotemporary things together, we prefer the translation: “when at the same time in the dust there is rest.” The descent of his hope to the bars of Hades is at the same time his own, who hopes for nothing but this. When his hope of death becomes a reality, then at the same time his turmoil of suffering will pass over to the rest of the grave.

As from the second speech of Eliphaz, so also from this first speech of Job, it may be seen that the controversy takes a fresh turn, which brings it nearer to the maturity of decision. From Eliphaz’ speech Job has seen that no assertion of his innocence can avail to convince the friends, and that the more strongly he maintains his innocence, even before God, he only confirms them in the opinion that he is suffering the punishment of his godlessness, which now comes to light, like a wrong that has been hitherto concealed. Job thus perceives that he is incapable of convincing the friends; for whatever he may say only tends to confirm them in the false judgment, which they first of all inferred from their false premises, but now from his own words and conduct. He is accounted by them as one who is punished of God, whom they address as the preachers of repentance; now, however, they address him so that the chief point of their sermon is no longer bright promises descriptive of the glorious future of the penitent, but fearful descriptions of the desolating judgment which comes upon the impenitent sinner. This zealous solicitude for his welfare seems to be clever and to the point, according to their view; it is, however, only a vexatious method of treating their friend's case; it is only roughly and superficially moulded according to the order of redemption, but without an insight into the spiritual experience and condition of him with whom they have here to do. Their prudentialia pastoralis is carnal and legal; they know nothing of a righteousness which avails before God, and nothing of a state of grace which frees from the divine vengeance; they know not how to deal with one who is passing through the fierce conflict of temptation, and understand not the mystery of the cross.

Can we wonder, then, that Job is compelled to regard their words as nothing more than דברי רוח, as they regarded his? In the words of Job they miss their certainly compact dogma, in which they believe they possess the philosopher's stone, by means of which all earthly suffering is to be changed into earthly prosperity. Job, however, can find nothing in their words that reminds him of anything he ought to know in his present position, or that teaches him anything respecting it. He is compelled to regard them as מנחמי עמל, who make the burden of his suffering only more grievous, instead of lightening it for him. For their consolation rests upon an unjust judgment of himself, against which his moral consciousness rebels, and upon a one-sided notion of God, which is contradicted by his experience. Their speeches exhibit skill as to their form, but the sympathy of the heart is wanting. Instead of plunging with Job into the profound mystery of God's providence, which appoints such a hard lot for the righteous man to endure, they shake their heads, and think: What a great sinner Job must be, that God should visit him with so severe a punishment! It is the same shaking of the head of which David complains Ps. xxii. 8 and cix. 25, and which the incomparably righteous One experienced from those who passed by His cross, Matt. xxvii. 39, Mark xv. 29. These comparisons give us the opportunity of noting the remarkable coincidence of these pictures of suffering, in outline and expression; the agreement of Job xvi. 8 with Ps. cix. 24, comp. cix. 23 with Job xvii. 7, puts it beyond a doubt, that there is a mutual relation between Job xvi. 4 and Ps. cix. 25 which is not merely accidental.

By such unjust and uncharitable treatment from the friends, Job's sufferings stand forth before him in increased magnitude. He exceeds himself in the most terrible figures, in order to depict the sudden change which the divine dispensation of suffering has brought upon him. The figures are so terrible, for Job sees behind his sufferings a hostile hideous God as their author; they are the outburst of His anger, His quivering looks, His piercing darts, His shattering missiles. His sufferings are a witness de facto against him, the sufferer; but they are this not merely in themselves, but also in the eyes of the people around him. To the sufferings which he has directly to endure in body and soul there is added, as it were, as their other equally painful part, misconstruction and scorn, which he has to suffer from without. Not only does he experience the wrath of God contrary to the testimony to his righteousness which his consciousness gives him, but also the scoff of the ungodly, who now deridingly triumph over him. Therefore he clothes himself in mourning, and lies with his former majesty in the dust ; his face is red with weeping, and his eyes are become almost blind, although there is no wrong in his hand, and his prayer is free from hypocrisy. Who does not here think of the servant of Jehovah, of whom Isaiah, ch. liii. 9 (in similar words to those which Job uses of himself, ch. xvi. 16), says, that he is buried among the godless על לא-חמם עשה ולא מרמה בפיו ? All that Job says here of the scorn that he has to endure by being regarded as one who is punished of God and tormented, agrees exactly with the description of the sufferings of the servant of Jehovah in the Psalms and the second part of Isaiah. Job says : they gape at me with their mouth ; and in Ps. xxii. 8 (comp. xxxv. 21) it is : all they that see me laugh me to scorn, they open wide the lips, they shake the head. Job says : they smite my cheeks in contempt ; and the servant of Jehovah, Isa. l. 6, is compelled to confess : I gave my back to the smiters, and my cheeks to them that pluck off the hair ; I hid not my face from shame and spitting. Like Job, the servant of Jehovah in the Psalms and in Isaiah II. is delivered over into the hands of the unrighteous, and reckoned among evil-doers, although he is the servant of Jehovah, and knows himself to be Jehovah's servant. The same hope that he expresses in Isa. l. 8 sq. in the words : he is near who justifieth me, who will condemn me !—the same hope in Job breaks through the night of conflict, with which his direct and indirect suffering has surrounded him.

Just when Job becomes conscious of his doubled affliction in all its heaviness, when he feels himself equally rejected of men as of God, must this hope break forth. For there is only a twofold possibility for a man who thinks God has become his enemy, and that he has not a friend among men : either he sinks into the abyss of despair ; or if faith still exists, he struggles upwards through his desertion by God and man to the love that lies deep in the heart of God, which in spite of hostile manifestation cannot abandon the righteous. Whither shall Job turn when God seems to him as an enemy, and when he nevertheless will not renounce God? He can only turn from the hostile God to the God who is differently disposed towards him, and that is equivalent to saying from the imaginary to the real God, to whom faith clings throughout every outward manifestation of wrath and wrathful feeling.¹ Since both, however, is one God, who only seems to be other than He is, that bold grasp of faith is the exchange of the phantom-god of the conflict of temptation for the true God. Faith, which in its essence is a perception capable of taking root, seizes the real existence behind the appearance, the heart behind the countenance, that which remains the same behind the change, and defies a thousand contradictions with the saintly Nevertheless: God nevertheless does not belie himself.

Job challenges the earth not to hide his blood; unceasingly without restraint shall the cry of his blood rise up. What he says in ch. xvi. 18 is to be taken not so much as the expression of a desire as of a demand, and better still as a command; for even in case he should succumb to his sufferings, and consequently in the eyes of men die the death of a sinner, his clear consciousness of innocence does not allow him to renounce his claim to a public declaration that he has died guiltless. But to whom shall the blood of the slain cry out? To whom else but God; and yet it is God who has slain him? We see distinctly here how Job's idea of God is lighted up by the prospect of a decisive trial of his cause. The God who abandons Job to death as guilty, and the God who cannot (and though it should be only after death) leave him unvindicated, come forth distinct and separate as darkness from light from the chaos of the conflict of temptation. Since, however, the thought of a vindication after death for Job, who knows only of a seeming life after death, according to the notion that rules him, and which is here not yet broken through, is only the extreme demanded by his moral consciousness, he is compelled to believe in a vindication in this world; and he expresses this faith (ch. xvi. 19) in these words: "Even now, behold, my Witness is in heaven, and One who acknowledgeth me is in the heights." He pours forth tears to this God that He would decide between God and him, between his friends and him. He longs for this decision now, for he will now soon be gone beyond return. Thus Job becomes here the prophet of the issue of his own course of suffering; and over his relation to Eloah and to the friends, of whom the former abandons him to the sinner's death, and the latter declare him to be guilty, hovers the form of the God of the future, which now breaks through the darkness, from whom Job believingly awaits and implores what the God of the present withholds from him.¹

What Job (ch. xvi. 20 sq.), by reason of that confident "Behold, my Witness is in heaven," had expressed as the end of his longing,—that God would vindicate him both before Himself, and before the friends and the world,—urges him onward, when he reflects upon his twofold affliction, that he is sick unto death and one who is misjudged even to mockery, to the importunate request: Lay down now (a pledge), be surety for me with Thyself; for who else should strike his hand into mine, i.e. in order to become bondsman to me, that

Thou dost not regard me as an unrighteous person? The friends are far from furnishing a guarantee of this; for they, on the contrary, are desirous of persuading him, that, if he would only let his conscience speak, he must regard himself as an unrighteous one, and that he is regarded as such by God. Therefore God cannot give them the victory; on the contrary, he who so uncompassionately abandons his friends, must on his own children experience similar suffering to that which he made heavier for his friend, instead of making it lighter to him. The three have no insight into the affliction of the righteous one; they dispose of him mercilessly, as of spoil or property that has fallen into the hands of the creditor; therefore he cannot hope to obtain justice unless God become surety for him with Himself,—a thought so extraordinary and bold, that one cannot wonder that the old expositors were misled by it: God was in Christ, and reconciled the world with Himself, 2 Cor. v. 19. The God of holy love has reconciled the world with himself, the God of righteous anger, as Job here prays that the God of truth may become surety for him with the God of absolute sovereignty.

When Job then complains of the misconstruction of his character, and tracing it to God, says: He hath made me לְמַשֵּׁל עִמִּי, one is reminded, in connection with this extravagant expression, of complaints of a like tone in the mouth of the true people of Israel, Ps. xlv. 15, and of the great sufferer, Ps. lxix. 12. When we further read, that, according to Job's affirmation, the godly are scared at his affliction, the parallel Isa. lii. 14 forces itself upon us, where it is said of the servant of Jehovah, "How were many astonished at thee." And when, with reference to himself, Job says that the suffering of the righteous must at length prove a gain to him that hath clean hands, who does not call to mind the fact that the glorious issue of the suffering of the servant of Jehovah which the Old Testament evangelist sets before us, —that servant of Jehovah who, once himself a prey to oppression and mocking, now divides the spoil among the mighty,—tends to the reviving, strengthening, and exaltation of Israel? All these parallels cannot and are not intended to prove that the book of Job is an allegorical poem; but they prove that the book of Job stands in the closest connection, both retrospective and prospective, with the literature of Israel; that the poet, by the relation to the passion-psalms stamped on the picture of the affliction of Job, has marked Job, whether consciously or unconsciously, as a typical person; that, by taking up, probably not unintentionally, many national traits, he has made it natural to interpret Job as a Mashal of Israel; and that Isaiah himself confirms this typical relation, by borrowing some Job-like expressions in the figure of the עֶבֶר יְהוּה, who is a personification of the true Israel. The book of Job has proved itself a mirror of consolation for the people, faithful to God, who had cause to complain, as in Ps. xliv., and a mirror of warning to their scoffers and persecutors, who had neither true sympathy with the miserable state of God's people, nor a true perception of God's dealings. At the same time, however, Job appears in the light which the New Testament history, by the fulfilment of the prophecies of suffering in the Psalms, Isaiah, and also Zechariah, throws upon him, as a type of Him who suffers in like manner, in order that Satan may have his deserts, and thereby be confounded; who also has an affliction to bear which in itself has the nature and form of wrath, but has its motive and end in the love of God; who is just so misjudged and scorned of men, in order at length to be exalted, and to enter in as intercessor for those who despised and rejected Him. At the same time, it must not be forgotten that there remains an infinite distance between the type and anti-type, which, however, must be in the very nature of a type, and does not annul the typical relation, which exists only exceptis excipiendis. Who could fail to recognise the involuntary picture of the three friends in the penitent ones of Isa. liii., who esteemed the servant of Jehovah as one smitten of God, for whom, however, at last His sacrifice and intercession avail?

Job at last considers his friends as devoid of wisdom, because they try to comfort him with the nearness of light, while darkness is before him; because they give him the hope of a bodily restoration, while he has nothing to expect but death, and earnestly longs for the rest of death. It is surprising that the speech of Job plunges again into complete hopelessness, after he has risen to the prospect of being vindicated in this life. He certainly does not again put forth that prospect, but he does not even venture to hope that it can be realized by a blessing in this life after a seeming curse. It is in this hopelessness that the true greatness of Job's faith becomes manifest. He meets death, and to every appearance is overwhelmed by death, as a sinner, while he is still conscious that he is righteous. Is it not faith in and fidelity to God, then, that, without praying for recovery, he is satisfied with this one thing, that God acknowledges him? The promises of the friends ought to have rested on a different foundation, if he was to have the joy of appropriating them to himself. He feels himself to be inevitably given up as a prey to death, and as from the depth of Hades, into which he is sinking, he stretches out his hands to God, not that He would sustain him in life, but that He would acknowledge him before the world as His. If he is to die even, he desires only that he may not die the death of a criminal. And is this intended at the same time for the rescue of his honour? No, after all, for the honour of God, who cannot possibly destroy as an evil-doer one who is in everything faithful to Him. When, then, the issue of the history is that God acknowledges Job as His servant, and after he is proved and refined by the temptation, preserves to him a doubly rich and prosperous life, Job receives beyond his prayer and comprehension ; and after he has learned from his own experience that God brings to Hades and out again, he has for ever conquered all fear of death, and the germs of a hope of a future life, which in the midst of his affliction have broken through his consciousness, can joyously expand. For Job appears to himself as one who is risen from the dead, and is a pledge to himself of the resurrection from the dead.

Bildad's Second Speech.—Chap. xviii.

Schema : 4. 9. 8. 8. 8. 4.

[Then began Bildad the Shuhite, and said :]

2 How long will ye hunt for words ? !

Attend, and afterwards we will speak.

3 Wherefore are we accounted as beasts,

And narrow-minded in your eyes ?

Job's speeches are long, and certainly are a trial of patience to the three, and the heaviest trial to Bildad, whose turn now comes on, because he is at pains throughout to be brief. Hence the reproach of endless babbling with which he begins here, as at ch. viii. 2, when he at last has an opportunity of speaking ; in connection with which it must, however, not be forgotten that Job also, ch. xvi. 3, satirically calls upon them to cease. He is indeed more entitled than his opponents to the entreaty not to weary him with long speeches. The question, ver. 2a, if קַנְיִי is derived from קָנָה, furnishes no sense, unless perhaps it is, with Ralbag, explained : how long do you make close upon close in order, when you seem to have come to an end, to begin continually anew ? For to give the thought : how long do you make no end of speaking, it must have been עַד-אֵנָּה לֹא, as the LXX. (μέχρι τίνος οὐ παύσῃ;) involuntarily inserts the negative. And what should the plur. mean by this rendering? The form קָנַצִי = קָצִי would not cause doubt; for though קָצִים does not occur elsewhere in the Old Testament, it is nevertheless sufficient that it is good Aramaic (קָצִין), and that another Hebr. plural, as קָצִי, קָצִי, קָצִי, would have been hardly in accordance with the usage of the language here. But the plural would not be suitable here generally, the over-delicate explanation of Ralbag perhaps excepted. Since the book of Job abounds in Arabisms, and in Arabic قَتَصُ (as synon. of صَاد) signifies venari, venando capere, and قَتَصُ (مَقْتَصُ) cassis, rete venatorium; since, further, שִׁים קָנָצִים (comp. שִׁים אָרַב, Jer. ix. 7) is an incontrovertible reading, and all the difficulties in connection with the reference to קִין lying in the עֲרֵאנָה לֹא and in the plur. vanish, we translate with Castell., Schultens, J. D. Mich., and most modern expositors: how long (here not different from ch. viii. 2, xix. 2) will ye lay snares (construct state, as also by the other rendering, like ch. xxiv. 5, according to Ges. § 116, 1) for words; which, however, is not equivalent to hunt for words in order to contradict, but in order to talk on continually.¹ Job is the person addressed, for Bildad agrees with the two others. It is remarkable, however, that he addresses Job with “you.” Some say that he thinks of Job as ‘one of a number; Ewald observes that the controversy becomes more wide and general; and Schlottm. conjectures that Bildad fixes his eye on individuals of his hearers, on whose countenances he believed he saw a certain inclination to side with Job. This conjecture we will leave to itself; but the remark which Schlottm. also makes, that Bildad regards

Job as a type of a whole class, is correct, only one must also add, this address in the plur. is a reply to Job's sarcasm (xii. 2) by a similar one. As Job has told the friends that they act as if they were mankind in general, and all wisdom were concentrated in them, so Bildad has taken it amiss that Job connects himself with the whole of the truly upright, righteous, and pure; and he addresses him in the plural, because he, the unit, has puffed himself up as such a collective whole. This wrangler—he means—with such a train behind him, cannot accomplish anything: Oh that you would understand (וְהָיִיתֶם, as e.g. ch. xlii. 3, not causative, as vi. 24), i.e. come to your senses, and afterward we will speak, i.e. it is only then possible to walk in the way of understanding. That is not now possible, when he, as one who plays the part of their many, treats them, the three who are agreed in opposition to him, as totally void of understanding, and each one of them unwise, in expressions like ch. xvii. 4, 10. Looking to Ps. xlix. 13, 21, one might be tempted to regard נְטַמִּינוּ (on the vowel i instead of é, vid. Ges. § 75, rem. 7) as an interchange of consonants from נִדְמִינוּ: silenced, made an end of, profligati; but the supposition of this interchange of consonants would be arbitrary. On the other hand, there is no suitable thought in “why are we accounted unclean?” (Vulg. sorduimus), from טָמָה = טָמֵא, Lev. xi. 43 (Ges. § 75, vi.); the complaint would have no right connection, except it were a very slight one, with ch. xvii. 9. On the contrary, if we suppose a verb טָמָה in the signification opplere, obturare, which is peculiar to this consonant-combination in the whole range of the Semitic languages (comp. אָטַם, אָטַם, obstruere, Aram. טָמַם, Arab. طَمَّ, e.g. Talm.: transgression stoppeth up, טַמְטַמְטַמ, man's heart), and after which this טָמָה has been explained by the Jewish expositors (Raschi: נְחַשְׁבֵּנוּ טְמוּמִים), and is interpreted by סָתַם (Parchon: נִסְתַּמָּה דַּעְתָּנוּ), we gain a sense which corresponds both with previous reproaches of Job and the parallelism, and we decide in its favour with the majority of modern expositors. With the interrogative Wherefore, Bildad appeals to Job's conscience. These invectives proceed from an impassioned self-delusion towards the truth, which he wards off from himself, but cannot however alter.

- 4 *Thou art he who teareth himself in his anger :
Shall the earth become desolate for thy sake,
And a rock remove from its place ?*
- 5 *Notwithstanding, the light of the wicked shall be put out,
And the glow of his fire shineth not ;*
- 6 *The light becometh dark in his tent,
And his lamp above him is extinguished ;*
- 7 *His vigorous steps are straitened,
And his own counsel casteth him down.*

The meaning of the strophe is this : Dost thou imagine that, by thy vehement conduct, by which thou art become enraged against thyself, thou canst effect any change in the established divine order of the world ? It is a divine law, that sufferings are the punishment of sin ; thou canst no more alter this, than that at thy command, or for thy sake, the earth, which is appointed to be the habitation of man (Isa. xlv. 18), will become desolate (té'ázab with the tone drawn back, according to Ges. § 29, 3, b, Arab. with similar signification in intrans. Kal t'azibu), or a rock remove from its place (on פָּרָץ, vid. ch. xiv. 18). Bildad here lays to Job's charge what Job, in ch. xvi. 9, has said of God's anger, that it tears him : he himself tears himself in his rage at the inevitable lot under which he ought penitently to bow. The address, ver. 4*a*, as apud Arabes ubique fere (Schult.), is put objectively (not : Oh thou, who) ; comp. what is said on כָּלֵם, ch. xvii. 10, which is influenced by the same syntactic custom

The LXX. transl. ver. 4b: Why! will Hades be tenantless if thou diest (ἐὰν σὺ ἀποθάνῃς)? after which Rosenm. explains: tuâ causâ h. e. te cadente. But that ought to be תְּכַמֹּתָהּ. The peopling of the earth is only an example of the arrangements of divine omnipotence and wisdom, the continuance of which is exalted over the human power of volition, and does not in the least yield to human self-will, as (ver. 4c) the rock is an example, and at the same time an emblem, of what God has fixed and rendered immoveable. That of which he here treats as fixed by God is the law of retribution. However much Job may rage, this law is and remains the unavoidable power that rules over the evil-doer.

Ver. 5. מַה is here equivalent to nevertheless, or prop. even, ὅμως, as e.g. Ps. cxxix. 2 (Ew. § 354, a). The light of the evil-doer goes out, and the comfortable brightness and warmth which the blaze (שָׁרִיב, only here as a Hebr. word; according to Raschi and others, étincelle, a spark; but according to LXX., Theod., Syr., Jer., a flame; Targ. the brightness of light) of his fire in his dwelling throws out, comes to an end. In one word, as the præt. מִן הַשֵּׁנִי implies, the light in his tent is changed into darkness; and his lamp above him, i.e. the lamp hanging from the covering of his tent (ch. xxix. 3, comp. xxi. 17), goes out. When misfortune breaks in upon him, the Arab says: ed-dahru attfaa es-sirâgi, fate has put out my lamp; this figure of the decline of prosperity receives here a fourfold application. The figure of straitening one's steps is just as Arabic as it is biblical; צִעְרֵי אֹנִי, the steps of his strength (אֹנִי synon. of כֹּחַ, ch. xl. 16) become narrow (comp. Prov. iv. 12, Arab. takâssarat), by the wide space which he could pass over with a self-confident feeling of power becoming more and more contracted; and the purpose formed selfishly and without any recognition of God, the success of which he considered infallible, becomes his overthrow.

- 8 *For he is driven into the net by his own feet,
And he walketh over a snare.*
- 9 *The trap holdeth his heel fast,
The noose bindeth him.*
- 10 *His snare lieth hidden in the earth,
His nets upon the path ;*
- 11 *Terrors affright him on every side,
And scare him at every step.*

The Pual שָׁלַח signifies not merely to be fallen into, but driven into, like the Piel, ch. xxx. 12, to drive away, and as it is to be translated in the similar passage in the song of Deborah, Judg. v. 15: "And as Issachar, Barak was driven (i.e. with desire for fighting) behind him down into the valley (the place of meeting under Mount Tabor) ;" בִּרְגְלָיו, which there signifies, according to Judg. iv. 10, viii. 5, "upon his feet = close behind him," is here intended of the intermediate cause: by his own feet he is hurried into the net, i.e. against his will, and yet with his own feet he runs into destruction. The same thing is said in ver. 8*b* ; the way on which he complacently wanders up and down (which the Hithp. signifies here) is שִׁבְכָה, lattice-work, here a snare (Arab. schabacah, a net, from שָׁבַע, schabaca, to intertwine, weave), and consequently will suddenly break in and bring him to ruin. This fact of delivering himself over to destruction is established in futt. (ver. 9) used as præs., of which one is contracted, without the voluntative signification in accordance with the poetic licence: a trap catches a heel (poetic brevity for: the trap catches his heel), a noose seizes upon him, עָלָיו (but with the accompanying notion of overpowering him, which the translation "bind" is intended to express). Such is the meaning of צָמַם here, which is not plur., but sing., from צָמַם layer (ch. v. 5) and of snare; the form (as אֲדִיר, אֲבִיר) corresponds more to the former, but does not, however, exclude the latter, as אֲבִיר and לָפִיד (λαμπάς) show.

The continuation in ver. 10 of the figure of the fowler affirms that that issue of his life (ver. 9) has been preparing long beforehand; the prosperity of the evil-doer from the beginning tends towards ruin. Instead of הִבְלֵנוּ we have the pointing הִבְלֵנוּ, as it would be in Arab. in a similar sense hhabluhu (from hhabl, a cord, a net). The nearer destruction is now to him, the stronger is the hold which his foreboding has over him, since, as ver. 11 adds, terrible thoughts (בְּלִיָּהוֹת) and terrible apparitions fill him with dismay, and haunt him, following upon his feet. לִרְגֵלָיו, close behind him, as Gen. xxx. 30, 1 Sam. xxv. 42, Isa. xli. 2, Hab. iii. 5. The best authorized pointing of the verb is וְהִפְצִיחֵהוּ, with Segol (Ges. § 104, 2, c), Chateph-Segol, and Kibbutz. Except in Hab. iii. 14, where the prophet includes himself with his people, הִפְצִין, diffundere, dissipare (vid. ch. xxxvii. 11, xl. 11), never has a person as its obj. elsewhere. It would also probably not be used, but for the idea that the spectres of terror pursue him at every step, and are now here, now there, and his person is as it were multiplied.

- 12 *His calamity looketh hunger-bitten,
And misfortune is ready for his fall.*
- 13 *It devoureth the members of his skin ,
The first-born of death devoureth his members.*
- 14 *That in which he trusted is torn away out of his tent,
And he must march on to the king of terrors.*
- 15 *Beings strange to him dwell in his tent ;
Brimstone is strewn over his habitation.*

The description of the actual and total destruction of the evil-doer now begins with יָדִי (as ch. xxiv. 14, after the manner of the voluntative forms already used in ver. 9)

Step by step it traces his course to the total destruction, which leaves no trace of him, but still bears evident marks of being the fulfilment of the curse pronounced upon him. In opposition to this explanation, Targ., Raschi, and others, explain אָנוּ according to Gen. xlix. 3: the son of his manhood's strength becomes hungry, which sounds comical rather than tragic; another Targ. transl.: he becomes hungry in his mourning, which is indeed inadmissible, because the signif. planctus, luctus, belongs to the derivatives of אָנָה, אָנָן, but not to אָן. But even the translation recently adopted by Ew., Stick., and Schlottm., "his strength becomes hungry," is unsatisfactory; for it is in itself no misfortune to be hungry, and רָעַב does not in itself signify "exhausted with hunger." It is also an odd metaphor, that strength becomes hungry; we would then rather read with Reiske, רָעַב בָּאָנוּ, famelicus in media potentia sua. But as אָן signifies strength (ch. xviii. 7), so אָנָן (root אָן, to breathe and pant) signifies both wickedness and evil (the latter either as evil = calamity, or as anhelitus, sorrow, Arab. ain); and the thought that his (i.e. appointed to the evil-doer) calamity is hungry to swallow him up (Syr., Hirz., Hahn, and others), suits the parallelism perfectly: "and misfortune stands ready for his fall."¹ אָדָר signifies prop. a weight, burden, then a load of suffering, and gen. calamity (root אָדָר, Arab. âda, e.g. Sur. 2, 256, la jaûduhu, it is not difficult for him, and adda, comp. on Ps. xxxi. 12); and אָלְעָו

not : at his side (Ges., Ew., Schlottm., Hahn), but, according to Ps. xxxv. 15, xxxviii. 18 : for his fall (LXX. freely, but correctly : ἐξασιον); for instead of "at the side" (Arab. ila ganbi), they no more say in Hebrew than in Germ. "at the ribs."

Ver. 13 figuratively describes how calamity takes possession of him. The members, which are called יָצִירִים in ch. xvii. 7, as parts of the form of the body, are here called בְּרִיִּים, as the parts into which the body branches out, or rather, since the word originally signifies a part, as that which is actually split off (vid. on ch. xvii. 16, where it denotes "cross-bars"), or according to appearance that which rises up, and from this primary signification applied to the body and plants, the members (not merely as Farisol interprets : the veins) of which the body consists and into which it is distributed. עוֹר (distinct from נֶלֶךְ, ch. xvi. 15, similar in meaning to Arab. baschar, but also to the Arab. gild, of which the former signifies rather the epidermis, the latter the skin in the widest sense) is the soluble surface of the naked animal body. בְּכוֹר מָוֶת devours this, and indeed, as the repetition implies, gradually, but surely and entirely. "The first-born of the poor," Isa. xiv. 30, are those not merely who belong (בְּנֵי) to the race of the poor, but the poor in the highest sense and first rank. So here diseases are conceived of as children of death, as in the Arabic malignant fevers are called benât el-

Beduins) is a state of mind which only occurs among us in a lower degree, but among the Arabs it is worthy of note as a psychological fact. If the wahm (الوهم), or idea of some great and inevitable danger or misfortune, overpowers the Arab, all strength of mind and body suddenly forsakes him, so that he breaks down powerless and defenceless. Thus on July 8, 1860, in Damascus, in a few hours, about 6000 Christian men were slain, without any one raising a hand or uttering a cry for mercy. Both European and native doctors have assured me the ro'b in Arabia kills, and I have witnessed instances myself. Since it often produces a stiffness of the limbs with chronic paralysis, all kinds of paralysis are called ro'b, and the paralytics mar'ûb.—WETZST.

menîjeh, daughters of fate or death; that disease which Bildad has in his mind, as the one more terrible and dangerous than all others, he calls the "first-born of death," as that in which the whole destroying power of death is contained, as in the first-born the whole strength of his parent.¹ The Targ. understands the figure similarly, since it transl. מְלֹאֲךָ מוֹתָא (angel of death); another Targ. has instead יְשֵׁרֵי מוֹתָא, the firstling of death, which is intended in the sense of the primogenita (= præmatura) mors of Jerome. Least of all is it to be understood with Ewald as an intensive expression for בְּנֵי־מוֹת, 1 Sam. xx. 31, of the evil-doer as liable to death. While now disease in the most fearful form consumes the body of the evil-doer, מְבַטְחוֹ (with Dag. f. impl., as ch. viii. 14, xxxi. 24, Olsh. § 198, b) (a collective word, which signifies everything in which he trusted) is torn away out of his tent; thus also Rosenm., Ew., and Umbr. explain, while Hirz., Hlgst., Schlottm., and Hahn regard מְבַטְחוֹ as in apposition to אֶהְלֹו, in favour of which ch. viii. 14 is only a seemingly suitable parallel. It means everything that made the ungodly man happy as head of a household, and gave him the brightest hopes of the future. This is torn away (evellitur) from his household, so that he, who is dying off, alone survives. Thus, therefore, ver. 14b describes how he also himself dies at last. Several modern expositors, especially Stickel, after the example of Jerome (et calcet super eum quasi rex interitus), and of the Syr. (præcipitem eum reddent terrores regis), take בְּלָהוֹת as subj., which is syntactically possible (vid. ch. xxvii. 20, xxx. 15): and destruction causes him to march towards itself (Ges.: fugant eum) like a military leader; but since הִצְעִיר signifies to cause to approach, and since no אֵלָיו (to itself) stands with it, לְמַלְכָּה is to be considered as denoting the goal, especially as לְ never directly signifies instar. In the passage advanced in its favour it denotes that which anything becomes, that which one makes a thing by the mode of treatment (ch. xxxix. 16), or whither anything extends (e.g. in Schultens on ch. xiii. 12: they had claws li-machâlîbi, i.e. “approaching to the claws” of wild beasts).¹ One falls into these strange interpretations when one departs from the accentuation, which unites מֶלֶךְ בְּלָהוֹת quite correctly by Munach.

Death itself is called “the king of terrors,” in distinction from the terrible disease which is called its first-born. Death is also personified elsewhere, as Isa. xxviii. 15, and esp. Ps. xlix. 15, where it appears as a רֹעֶה, ruler in Hades, as in the Indian mythology the name of the infernal king Jamas signifies the tyrant or the tamer. The biblical representation does not recognise a king of Hades, as Jamas and Pluto: the judicial power of death is allotted to angels, of whom one, the angel of the abyss, is called Abaddon (אַבְדֹּן), Apoc. ix. 11; and the chief possessor of this judicial power, ὁ τὸ κράτος ἔχων τοῦ θανάτου, is, according to Heb. ii. 14, the angel-prince, who, according to the prologue of our book, has also brought a fatal disease upon Job, without, however, in this instance being able to go further than to bring him to the brink of the abyss. It would therefore not be contrary to the spirit of the book if we were to understand Satan by the king of terrors, who, among other appellations in Jewish theology, is called שר על-ההוה, because he has his existence in the Thohu, and seeks to hurl back every living being into the Thohu. But since the prologue casts a veil over that which remains unknown in this world in the midst of tragic woes, and since a reference to Satan is found nowhere else in the book—on the contrary, Job himself and the friends trace back directly to God that mysterious affliction which forms the dramatic knot—we understand (which is perfectly sufficient) by the king of terrors death itself, and with Hirz., Ew., and most expositors, transl.: “and it causes him to march onward to the king of terrors.” The “it” is a secret power, as also elsewhere the fem. is used as neut. to denote the “dark power” (Ewald, § 295,^a) of natural and supernatural events, although sometimes, e.g. ch. iv. 16, Isa. xiv. 9, the masc. is also so applied. After the evil-doer is tormented for a while with temporary בלהות, and made tender, and reduced to ripeness for death by the first-born of death, he falls into the possession of the king of בלהות himself; slowly and solemnly, but surely and inevitably (as הצעיר implies, with which is combined the idea of the march of a criminal to the place of execution), he is led to this king by an unseen arm.

In ver. 15 the description advances another step deeper into the calamity of the evil-doer's habitation, which is now become completely desolate. Since ver. 15*b* says that brimstone (from heaven, Gen. xix. 24, Ps. xi. 6) is strewn over the evil-doer's habitation, i.e. in order to mark it as a place that, having been visited with the fulfilment of the curse, shall not henceforth be rebuilt and inhabited (vid. Deut. xxix. 22 sq., and supra, on ch. xv. 28), ver. 15*a* cannot be intended to affirm that a company of men strange to him take up their abode in his tent. But we shall not, however, on that account take בלהות as the subj. of תִּשְׁבֶּן. The only natural translation is: what does not belong to him dwells in his tent (Ew. § 294, b); מִבֹּלַי, elsewhere præpos. (ch. iv. 11, 20, xxiv. 7 sq.), is here an adverb of negation, as which it is often used as an intensive of אֵין, e.g. Ex. xiv. 11. It is unnecessary to take the מ as partitive (Hirz.), although it can have a special signification, as Deut. xxviii. 55 (because not), by being separated from בֹּלַי. The neutral fem. תִּשְׁבֶּן refers to such inhabitants as are described in Isa. xiii. 20 sqq., xxvii. 10 sq., xxxiv. 11 sqq., Zeph. ii. 9, and in other descriptions of desolation. Creatures and things which are strange to the deceased rich man, as jackals and nettles, inhabit his domain, which is appointed to eternal unfruitfulness; neither children nor possessions survive him to keep up his name. What does dwell in his tent serves only to keep up the recollection of the curse which has overtaken him.¹

- 16 *His roots wither beneath,
And above his branch is lopped off.*
17 *His remembrance is vanished from the land,
And he hath no name far and wide on the plain;*
18 *They drive him from light into darkness,
And chase him out of the world.*
19 *He hath neither offspring nor descendant among his people,
Nor is there an escaped one in his dwellings.*

The evil-doer is represented under the figure of a plant, ver. 16, as we have had similar figures already, ch. viii. 16

sq., xv. 30, 32 sq.;¹ his complete extirpation is like the dying off of the root and of the branch, as Amos ii. 9, Isa. v. 24, and “let him not have a root below and a branch above” in the inscription on the sarcophagus of Eschmunazar. Here we again meet with יָמַל, the proper meaning of which is so disputed; it is translated by the Targ. (as by us) as Niph. יִתְמוֹלֵל, but the meaning “to wither” is near at hand, which, as we said on ch. xiv. 2, may be gained as well from the primary notion “to fall to pieces” (whence LXX. ἐπιπесείται), as from the primary notion “to parch, dry.” אָמַל (whence אִמְלֵל, formed after the manner of the Arabic IX. form, usually of failing; vid. Caspari, § 59) offers a third possible explanation; it signifies originally to be long and lax, to let anything hang down, and thence in Arab. (amala) to hope, i.e. to look out into the distance. Not the evil-doer’s family alone is rooted out, but also his memory. With הָרֵן, a very relative notion, both the street outside in front of the house (ch. xxxi. 32), and the pasture beyond the dwelling (ch. v. 10), are described; here it is to be explained according to Prov. viii. 26 (אֶרֶץ וְחִצּוֹת), where Hitz. remarks: “The LXX. translates correctly ἀουλήτους. The districts beyond each person’s land, which also belong to no one else, the desert, whither one goes forth, is meant.” So אֶרֶץ seems also here (comp. ch. xxx. 8) to denote the land that is regularly inhabited—Job himself is a large proprietor within the range of a city (ch. xxix. 7)—and הָרֵן the steppe traversed by the wandering tribes which lies out beyond. Thus also the Syr. version transl. ‘al apai barito, over the plain of the desert, after which the Arabic version is el-barrîje (the synonym of bedw, bâdiye, whence the name of the Beduin¹). What is directly said in ver. 17 is repeated figuratively in ver. 18; as also what has been figuratively expressed in ver. 16 is repeated in ver. 19 without figure. The subj. of the verbs in ver. 18 remains in the background, as ch. iv. 19, Ps. lxiii. 11, Luke xii. 20: they thrust him out of the light (of life, prosperity, and fame) into the darkness (of misfortune, death, and oblivion); so that the illustris becomes not merely ignobilis, but totally ignotus, and they hunt him forth (נִדְּרוּ from the Hiph. הִדָּר of the verb נָדַר, instead of which it might also be יִדְּרוּ from נָדָה, they banish him) out of the habitable world (for this is the signification of תֵּבֵל, the earth as built upon and inhabited). There remains to him in his race neither sprout nor shoot; thus the rhyming alliteration נֵן and נֶכֶד (according to Luzzatto on Isa. xiv. 22, used only of the descendants of persons in high rank, and certainly a nobler expression than our rhyming pairs: Germ. Stumpf und Stiel, Mann und Maus, Kind und Kegel). And there is no escaped one (as Deut. ii. 34 and freq., Arab. shârid, one fleeing; sharûd, a fugitive) in his abodes (מְגִוֵּר, as only besides Ps. lv. 16). Thus to die away without descendant and remembrance is still at the present day among the Arab races that profess Dîn Ibrâhîm (the religion of Abraham) the most unhappy thought, for the point of gravitation of continuance beyond the grave is transferred by them to the immortality of the righteous in the continuance of his posterity and works in this world (vid. supra, p. 260); and where else should it be at the time of Job, since no revelation had as yet drawn the curtain aside from the future world? Now follows the declamatory conclusion of the speech.

- 20 *Those who dwell in the west are astonished at his day,
And trembling seizeth those who dwell in the east ;*
21 *Surely thus it befalleth the dwellings of the unrighteous,
And thus the place of him that knew not God.*

It is as much in accordance with the usage of Arabic as it is biblical, to call the day of a man's doom "his day," the day of a battle at a place "the day of that place." Who are the אֲחֵרִיִּים who are astonished at it, and the קִדְמוֹנִים whom terror (שֹׁעַר) as twice besides in this sense in Ezek.) seizes, or as it is properly, who seize terror, i.e. of themselves, without being able to do otherwise than yield to the emotion (as ch. xxi. 6, Isa. xiii. 8 ; comp. on the contrary Ex. xv. 14 sq.) ? Hirz., Schlottm., Hahn, and others, understand posterity by אֲחֵרִיִּים, and by קִדְמוֹנִים their ancestors, therefore Job's contemporaries. But the return from the posterity to those then living is strange, and the usage of the language is opposed to it ; for קִדְמוֹנִים is elsewhere always what belongs to the previous age in relation to the speaker (e.g. 1 Sam. xxiv. 14, comp. Eccles. iv. 16). Since, then, קִדְמוֹנִי is used in the signification eastern (e.g. הַיָּם הַקִּדְמוֹנִי, the eastern sea = the Dead Sea), and אֲחֵרֶן in the signification western (e.g. הַיָּם הָאֲחֵרֶן, the western sea = the Mediterranean), it is much more suited both to the order of the words and the usage of the language to understand, with Schult., Oetinger, Umbr., and Ew., the former of those dwelling in the west, and the latter of those dwelling in the east. In the summarizing ver. 21, the retrospective pronouns are also prægn., like ch. viii. 19, xx. 29, comp. xxvi. 14 : Thus is it, viz. according to their fate, i.e. thus it befalls them ; and אֵן here retains its original affirmative signification (as in the concluding verse of Ps. lviii.), although in Hebrew this is blended with the restrictive. וְהָ

has Rebia mugrasch instead of great Schalscheleth,¹ and מְקוֹם has in correct texts Legarme, which must be followed by לֹא-יָרֵעַ with Illuj on the penult. On the relative clause לֹא-יָרֵעַ אֵל without אֲשֶׁר, comp. e.g. ch. xxix. 16; and on this use of the st. constr., vid. Ges. § 116, 3. The last verse is as though those mentioned in ver. 20 pointed with the finger to the example of punishment in the “desolated” dwellings which have been visited by the curse.

This second speech of Bildad begins, like the first (ch. viii. 2), with the reproach of endless babbling; but it does not end like the first (ch. viii. 22). The first closed with the words: “Thy haters shall be clothed with shame, and the tent of the godless is no more;” the second is only an amplification of the second half of this conclusion, without taking up again anywhere the tone of promise, which there also embraces the threatening.

It is manifest also from this speech, that the friends, to express it in the words of the old commentators, know nothing of evangelical but only of legal suffering, and also only of legal, nothing of evangelical, righteousness. For the righteousness of which Job boasts is not the righteousness of single works of the law, but of a conduct ordered according to God’s will, proceeding from faith, or (as the Old Testament generally says) from trust in God’s mercy, the weaknesses of which are forgiven because they are exonerated by the habitual disposition of the man and the primary aim of his actions. The fact that the principle, “suffering is the consequence of human unrighteousness,” is accounted by Bildad as the formula of an inviolable law of the moral order of the world, is closely connected with that outward aspect of human righteousness. One can only thus judge when one regards human righteousness and human destiny from the purely legal point of view. A man, as soon as we conceive him in faith, and therefore under grace, is no longer under that supposed exclusive fundamental law of the divine dealing. Brentius is quite right when he observes that the sentence of the law certainly is modified for the sake of the godly who have the word of promise. Bildad knows nothing of the worth and power which a man attains by a righteous heart. By faith he is removed from the domain of God's justice, which recompenses according to the law of works; and before the power of faith even rocks move from their place.

Bildad then goes off into a detailed description of the total destruction into which the evil-doer, after going about for a time oppressed with the terrors of his conscience as one walking over snares, at last sinks beneath a painful sickness. The description is terribly brilliant, solemn, and pathetic, as becomes the stern preacher of repentance with haughty mien and pharisaic self-confidence; it is none the less beautiful, and, considered in itself, also true—a masterpiece of the poet's skill in poetic idealizing, and in apportioning out the truth in dramatic form. The speech only becomes untrue through the application of the truth advanced, and this untruthfulness the poet has most delicately presented in it. For with a view of terrifying Job, Bildad interweaves distinct references to Job in his description; he knows, however, also how to conceal them under the rich drapery of diversified figures. The first-born of death, that hands the ungodly over to death itself, the king of terrors, by consuming the limbs of the ungodly, is the Arabian leprosy, which slowly destroys the body. The brimstone indicates the fire of God, which, having fallen from heaven, has burned up one part of the herds and servants of Job; the withering of the branch, the death of Job's children, whom he himself, as a drying-up root that will also soon die off, has survived. Job is the ungodly man, who, with wealth, children, name, and all that he possessed, is being destroyed as an example of punishment for posterity both far and near.

But, in reality, Job is not an example of punishment, but an example for consolation to posterity; and what posterity has to relate is not Job's ruin, but his wondrous deliverance (Ps. xxii. 31 sq.). He is no עֲלִיל, but a righteous man; not one who לֹא יָדַע-אֱלֹהִים, but he knows God better than the friends, although he contends with Him, and they defend Him. It is with him as with the righteous One, who complains, Ps. lxix. 21: "Contempt hath broken my heart, and I became sick: I hoped for sympathy, but in vain; for comforters, and found none;" and Ps. xxxviii. 12 (comp. xxxi. 12, lv. 13-15, lxix. 9, lxxxviii. 9, 19): "My lovers and my friends stand aloof from my stroke, and my kinsmen stand afar off." Not without a deep purpose does the poet make Bildad to address Job in the plural. The address is first directed to Job alone; nevertheless it is so put, that what Bildad says to Job is also intended to be said to others of a like way of thinking, therefore to a whole party of the opposite opinion to himself. Who are these like-minded? Hirzel rightly refers to ch. xvii. 8 sq. Job is the representative of the suffering and misjudged righteous, in other words: of the "congregation," whose blessedness is hidden beneath an outward form of suffering. One is hereby reminded that in the second part of Isaiah the עֶבֶר יְהוָה is also at one time spoken of in the sing., and at another time in the plur.; since this idea, by a remarkable contraction and expansion of expression (systole and diastole), at one time describes the one servant of Jehovah, and at another the congregation of the servants of Jehovah, which has its head in Him. Thus we again have a trace of the fact that the poet is narrating a history that is of universal significance, and that, although Job is no mere personification, he has in him brought forth to view an idea connected with the history of redemption. The ancient interpreters were on the track of this idea when they said in their way, that in Job we behold the image of Christ, and the figure of His church. Christi personam figuraliter gessit, says Beda ; and Gregory, after having stated and explained that there is not in the Old Testament a righteous man who does not typically point to Christ, says : Beatus Iob venturi cum suo corpore typum redemptoris insinuat.

Job's Second Answer.—Chap. xix.

Schema: 10. 10. 10. 10. 10. 10.

[Then began Job, and said :]

- 2 *How long will ye vex my soul,
And crush me with your words ?*
- 3 *These ten times have ye reproached me ;
Without being ashamed ye astound me.*
- 4 *And if I have really erred,
My error rests with myself.*
- 5 *If ye will really magnify yourselves against me,
And prove my reproach to me :*
- 6 *Know then that Eloah hath wronged me,
And hath compassed me with His net.*

This controversy is torture to Job's spirit ; enduring in himself unutterable agony, both bodily and spiritually, and in addition stretched upon the rack by the three friends with their united strength, he begins his answer with a well-justified quousque tandem. תַּנִּין (Norzi : תַּנִּין) is fut. energicum from הוֹנֶה (יָנַה), with the retention of the third radical, Ges. § 75, rem. 16. And in וַתִּדְבְּאוּנִי (Norzi : וַתִּדְבְּאוּנִי with quiescent Aleph) the suff. is attached to the ûn of the fut. energicum, Ges. § 60, rem. 3 ; the connecting vowel is a, and the suff. is ani, without epenthesis, not anni or an'ni, Ges. § 58.

4. In ver. 3 Job establishes his How long? Ten times is not to be taken strictly (Saad.), but it is a round number; ten, from being the number of the fingers on the human hand, is the number of human possibility, and from its position at the end of the row of numbers (in the decimal system) is the number of that which is perfected (vid. Genesis, S. 640 sq.); as not only the Sanskrit daṣan is traceable to the radical notion "to seize, embrace," but also the Semitic עשר is traceable to the radical notion "to bind, gather together" (cogn. קשר). They have already exhausted what is possible in reproaches, they have done their utmost. Renan, in accordance with the Hebr. expression, transl.: Voilà (וְהִנֵּה), as e.g. Gen. xxvii. 36) la dixième fois que vous m'insultez. The ἀπ. γερ. תַּהֲבִיר is connected by the Targ. with הֲבִיר (of respect of persons = partiality), by the Syr. with בִּרָא (to pain, of crève-cœur), by Raschi and Parchon with בִּיר (to mistake) or הַתְּבִיר (to alienate one's self), by Saadia (vid. Ewald's Beitr. S. 99) with עִיר (to dim, grieve¹); he, however, compares the Arab. هكر, stupere (which he erroneously regards as differing only in sound from تهر, to overpower, oppress); and Abulwalid (vid. Rödiger in Thes. p. 84 suppl.) explains تَهْكُرُون مَنِّي, ye gaze at me, since at the same time he mentions as possible that הֲכַר may be = כִּהַר, to treat indignantly, insultingly (which is only a different shade in sound of تَهْر,² and therefore refers to Saadia's interpretation). David Kimchi interprets according to Abulwalid, לוֹ תַחֲמְמוּ; he however remarks at the same time, that his father Jos. Kimchi interprets after the Arab. הֲכַר, which also signifies "shamelessness," תַּעֲזִיו פְּנֵיכֶם לִי. Since the idea of dark wild looks is connected with هكر, he has undoubtedly this verb in his mind, not that compared by Ewald (who translates, "ye are devoid of feeling towards me"), and especially חָכַר, to deal unfairly, used of usurious trade in corn (which may also have been thought of by the LXX. ἐπὶ κείσθαι μοι, and Jerome opprimentes), which signifies as intrans. to be obstinate about anything, pertinacious. Gesenius also, Thes. p. 84, suppl., suggests whether תִּהְיֶה may not perhaps be the reading. But the comparison with חָכַר is certainly safer, and gives a perfectly satisfactory meaning, only תִּהְיֶה must not be regarded as fut. Kal (as יִהְיֶה, Ps. lxxiv. 6, according to the received text), but as fut. Hiph. for תִּהְיֶה, according to Ges. § 53, rem. 4, 5, after which Schultens transl.: quod me ad stuporem redigatis. The connection of the two verbs in ver. 3b is to be judged of according to Ges. § 142, 3, a: ye shamelessly cause me astonishment (by the assurance of your accusations). One need not hesitate because it is תִּהְיֶה instead of תִּהְיֶה; this indication of the obj. by לְ, which is become a rule in Arabic with the inf. and part. (whence e.g. it would here be muhkerina li), and is still more extended in Aramaic, is also frequent in Hebrew (e.g. Isa. liii. 11, Ps. cxvi. 16, cxxix. 3, and 2 Chron. xxxii. 17, לְ, תִהְיֶה, after which Olsh. proposes to read תִּהְיֶה in the passage before us).

Much depends upon the correct perception of the structure of the clauses in ver. 4. The rendering, e.g., of Olshausen, gained by taking the two halves of the verse as independent clauses, "yea certainly I have erred, I am fully conscious of my error," puts a confession into Job's mouth, which is at present neither mature nor valid. Hirz., Hahn, Schlottm., rightly take ver. 4a as a hypothetical antecedent clause (comp. ch. vii. 20, xi. 18): and if I have really erred (אִם־אֶחָמָּה, as ch. xxxiv. 12, yea truly; Gen. xviii. 13, and if I should really), my error remains with me, i.e. I shall have to expiate it, without your having on this account any right to take upon yourselves the office of God and to treat me uncharitably; or what still better corresponds with אָפְּי תִּלֵּן : my transgression remains with me, without being communicated to another, i.e. without having any influence over you or others to lead you astray or involve you in participation of the guilt. Ver. 6 stands in a similar relation to ver. 5. Hirz., Ew., and Hahn take ver. 5 as a double question : "or will ye really boast against me, and prove to me my fault?" Schlottm., on the contrary, takes אָפְּ conditionally, and begins the conclusion with ver. 5b : "if ye will really look proudly down upon me, it rests with you at least, to prove to me by valid reasons, the contempt which ye attach to me." But by both of these interpretations, especially by the latter, ver. 6 comes in abruptly. Even אָפְּ (written thus in three other passages besides this) indicates in ver. 5 the conditional antecedent clause (comp. ix. 24, xxiv 25) of the expressive γνῶτε οὖν (δῆ) : if ye really boast yourselves against me (vid. Ps. lv. 13 sq., comp. xxxv. 26, xxxviii. 17), and prove upon me, i.e. in a way of punishment (as ye think), my shame, i.e. the sins which put me to shame (not : the right of shame, which has come upon me on account of my sins, an interpretation which the conclusion does not justify), therefore : if ye really continue (which is implied by the futt.) to do this, then know, etc. If they really maintain that he is suffering on account of flagrant sins, he meets them on the ground of this assumption with the assertion that God has wronged him (עֲוִיתִי short for עֲוִית מִשְׁפָּטִי, ch. viii. 3, xxxiv. 12, as Lam. iii. 36), and has cast His net (מְצֹר, with the change of the o of מְצֹר from צֹר, to search, hunt, into the deeper u in inflexion, as מְנוּחִי from מְנוּחַ, Ezek. iv. 8, from מְצֹר) over him, together with his right and his freedom, so that he is indeed obliged to endure punishment. In other words: if his suffering is really not to be understood otherwise than as the punishment of sin, as they would uncharitably and censoriously persuade him, it urges on his self-consciousness, which rebels against it, to the conclusion which he hurls into their face as one which they themselves have provoked.

- 7 *Behold I cry violence, and I am not heard;
I cry for help, and there is no justice.*
- 8 *My way He hath fenced round, that I cannot pass over,
And He hath set darkness on my paths.*
- 9 *He hath stripped me of mine honour,
And taken away the crown from my head.*
- 10 *He destroyed me on every side, then I perished,
And lifted out as a tree my hope.*
- 11 *He kindled His wrath against me,
And He regarded me as one of His foes.*

He cries aloud הָמָה (that which is called out regarded as accus. or as an interjection, vid. on Hab. i. 2), i.e. that illegal force is exercised over him. He finds, however, neither with God nor among men any response of sympathy and help; he cries for help (which שָׁעַ, perhaps connected with יִשְׁעַ, سعة, from יָשַׁע, وَجَعَ, seems to signify), without justice, i.e. the right of an impartial hearing and verdict, being attainable by him. He is like a prisoner who is confined to a narrow space (comp. ch. iii. 23, xiii. 27) and has no way out, since darkness is laid upon him wherever he may go. One is here reminded of Lam. iii. 7-9; and, in fact, this speech generally stands in no accidental mutual relation to the lamentations of Jeremiah. The "crown of my head" has also its parallel in Lam. v. 16; that which was Job's greatest ornament and most costly jewel is meant. According to ch. xxix. 14, צֶדֶק and כִּשְׁפָט were his robe and diadem. These robes of honour God has stripped from him, this adornment more precious than a regal diadem He has taken from him since, i.e., his affliction puts him down as a transgressor, and abandons him to the insult of those around him. God destroyed him round about (destruxit), as a house that is broken down on all sides, and lifted out as a tree his hope. וַיִּסְרֵץ does not in itself signify to root out, but only to lift out (ch. iv. 21, of the tent-cord, and with it the tent-pin) of a plant : to remove it from the ground in which it has grown, either to plant it elsewhere, as Ps. lxxx. 9, or as here, to put it aside. The ground was taken away from his hope, so that its greenness faded away like that of a tree that is rooted up. The fut. consec. is here to be translated : then I perished (different from ch. xiv. 20 : and consequently he perishes) ; he is now already one who is passed away, his existence is only the shadow of life. God has caused, fut. Hiph. apoc. וַיִּחַר , His wrath to kindle against him, and regarded him in relation to Himself as His opponents, therefore as one of them. Perhaps, however, the expression is intentionally intensified here, in contrast with ch. xiii. 24 : he, the one, is accounted by God as the host of His foes ; He treats him as if all hostility to God were concentrated in him.

- 12 *His troops came together,
And threw up their way against me,
And encamped round about my tent.*
- 13 *My brethren hath He removed far from me,
And my acquaintance are quite estranged from me.*
- 14 *My kinsfolk fail,
And those that knew me have forgotten me.*
- 15 *The slaves of my house and my maidens,
They regard me as a stranger,
I am become a perfect stranger in their eyes.*

It may seem strange that we do not connect ver. 12 with the preceding strophe or group of verses ; but between vers. 7 and 21 there are thirty $\sigma\tau\acute{\iota}\chi\omicron\iota$, which, in connection with the arrangement of the rest of this speech in decastichs (accidentally coinciding remarkably with the prominence given to the number ten in ver. 3a), seem intended to be divided into three decastichs, and can be so divided without doing violence to the connection. While in ver. 12, in connection with ver. 11, Job describes the course of the wrath, which he has to withstand as if he were an enemy of God, in vers. 13 sqq. he refers back to the degradation complained of in ver. 9. In ver. 12 he compares himself to a besieged (perhaps on account of revolt) city. God's נִדְרִים (not: bands of marauders, as Dietr. interprets, but: troops, i.e. of regular soldiers, synon. of צבא, ch. x. 17, comp. xxv. 3, xxix. 25, from the root נדר, to unite, join, therefore prop. the assembled, a heap; vid. Fürst's Handwörterbuch) are the bands of outward and inward sufferings sent forth against him for a combined attack (יחד). Heaping up a way, i.e. by filling up the ramparts, is for the purpose of making the attack upon the city with battering-rams (ch. xvi. 14) and javelins, and then the storm, more effective (on this erection of offensive ramparts (approches), called elsewhere שפך סללה, vid. Keil's Archäologie, § 159). One result of this condition of siege in which God's wrath has placed him is that he is avoided and despised as one smitten of God: neither love and fidelity, nor obedience and dependence, meet him from any quarter. What he has said in ch. xvii. 6, that he is become a byword and an abomination (an object to spit upon), he here describes in detail. There is no ground for understanding אָחֵי in the wider sense of relations; brethren is meant here, as in Ps. lxi. 9. He calls his relations קְרוֹבֵי, as Ps. xxxviii. 12. יָדָעִי are (in accordance with the pregnant biblical use of this word in the sense of nosse cum affectu et effectu) those who know him intimately (with objective suff. as Ps. lxxxvii. 4), and מֵיָדָעִי, as Ps. xxxi. 12, and freq., those intimately known to him; both, therefore, so-called heart- or bosom-friends. בְּרֵי בֵּיתִי Jer. well translates inquilini domus meæ; they are, in distinction from those who by birth belong to the nearer and wider circle of the family, persons who are received into this circle as servants, as vassals (comp. Ex. iii. 22, and Arabic جار, an associate, one sojourning in a strange country under the protection of its government, a neighbour), here espec. the domestics. The verb תַּחֲשֹׁבוּנִי (Ges. § 60) is construed with the nearest feminine subject. These people, who ought to thank him for taking them into his house, regard him as one who does not belong to it (זָר); he is looked upon by them as a perfect stranger (נִכְרִי), as an intruder from another country.

- 16 *I call to my servant and he answereth not,
I am obliged to entreat him with my mouth.*
- 17 *My breath is offensive to my wife,
And my stench to my own brethren.*
- 18 *Even boys act contemptuously towards me;
If I will rise up, they speak against me.*
- 19 *All my confidential friends abhor me,
And those whom I loved have turned against me.*
- 20 *My bone cleaveth to my skin and flesh,
And I am escaped only with the skin of my teeth.*

His servant, who otherwise saw every command in his eyes, and was attent upon his wink, now not only does not come at his call, but does not return him any answer. The one of the home-born slaves (vid. on Gen. xiv. 14¹), who stood in the same near connection to Job as Eliezer to Abraham, is intended here, in distinction from גִּרֵי בֵיתִי, ver. 15. If he, his master, now in such need of assistance, desires any service from him, he is obliged (fut. with the sense of being compelled, as e.g. ch. xv. 30b, xvii. 2) to entreat him with his mouth. הִתְחַנֵּן, to beg הֵן of any one for one's self (vid. supra, p. 222),

therefore to implore, supplicare; and בְּמוֹפִי here (as Ps. lxxxix. 2, cix. 30) as a more significant expression of that which is loud and intentional (not as ch. xvi. 5, in contrast to that which proceeds from the heart). In ver. 17a, רוּחִי signifies neither my vexation (Hirz.) nor my spirit = I (Umbr., Hahn, with the Syr.), for רוּח in the sense of angry humour (as ch. xv. 13) does not properly suit the predicate, and רוּחִי in the signification ipse may certainly be used in Arabic, where رُوح (perhaps under the influence of the philosophical usage of the language) signifies the animal spirit-life (Psychol. p. 182), not however in Hebrew, where נַפְשִׁי is the stereotype form in that sense. If one considers that the elephantiasis, although its proper pathological symptom consists in an enormous hypertrophy of the cellular tissue of single distinct portions of the body, still easily, if the bronchia are drawn into sympathy, or if (what is still more natural) putrefaction of the blood with a scorbutic ulcerous formation in the mouth comes on, has difficulty of breathing (ch. vii. 15) and stinking breath as its result, as also a stinking exhalation and the discharge of a stinking fluid from the decaying limbs is connected with it (vid. the testimony of the Arabian physicians in Stickel, S. 169 f.), it cannot be doubted that Jer. has lighted upon the correct thing when he transl. halitum meum exhorruit uxor mea. רוּחִי is intended as in ch. xvii. 1, and it is unnecessary to derive זֶרֶה from a special verb זָרַע, although in Arab. the notions which are united in the Hebr. זָרַע, deflectere and abhorreere (to turn one's self away from what is disgusting or horrible), are divided between زَارَ med. Wau and زَارَ med. Je (vid. Fürst's Handwörterbuch).

In ver. 17 the meaning of חַנּוּתִי is specially questionable. In Ps. lxxvii. 10, חַנּוּת is, like שְׁמוֹת, Ezek. xxxvi. 3, an infinitive from חָנַן, formed after the manner of the Lamed He verbs. Ges. and Olsh. indeed prefer to regard these forms as plurals of substantives (חַנּוּתָה, חַנּוּתָה), but the respective passages, regarded syntactically and logically, require infinitives. As regards the accentuation, according to which וְחִנּוּתִי is accented by Rebia mugrasch on the ultima, this does not necessarily decide in favour of its being infin., since in the 1 præt. סִבְּתִי, which, according to rule, has the tone on the penultima, the ultima is also sometimes (apart from the perf. consec.) found accented (on this, vid. on Ps. xvii. 3, and Ew. § 197, a), as סִבְּתִי, קִימֵה, קִימֵי, also admit of both accentuations.¹ If וְחִנּוּתִי is infin., the clause is a nominal clause, or a verbal one, that is to be supplemented by the v. fin. וְזָרָה; if it is first pers. præt., we have a verbal clause. It must be determined from the matter and the connection which of these explanations, both of which are in form and syntax possible, is the correct one. The translation, "I entreat (groan to) the sons of my body," is not a thought that accords with the context, as would be obtained by the infin. explanation: my entreating (is offensive); this signif. (prop. to Hithp. as above) assigned to Kal by von Hofmann (Schriftbew. ii. 2, 612) is at least not to be derived from the derivative חָנַן; it might be more easily deduced from נִחַנָּה, Jer. xxii. 23, which appears to be a Niph. like נִחַח from נָחַן, but might also be derived from נִחַחָה = נִחַחָה by means of a transposition (vid. Hitz.). In the present passage one might certainly compare חֵן, the usual word for the utterance and emotion of longing and sympathy, or also חֵן, fut. i (with the infin. noun chanîn), which occurs in the signifn. of weeping, and transl. : my imploring, groaning, weeping, is offensive, etc. Since, however, the X. form of the Arab. حَن (istachanna) signifies to give forth an offensive smell (esp. of the stinking refuse of a well that is dried up); and besides, since the significatn. fætere is supported for the root חָן (comp. צָחַן) by the Syriac chanîno (e.g. meshcho chanîno, rancid oil), we may also translate: "My stinking is offensive," etc., or: "I stink to the children of my body" (Rosenm., Ew., Hahn, Schlottm.); and this translation is not only not hazardous in a book that so abounds in derivations from the dialects, but it also furnishes a thought that is as closely as possible connected with ver. 17a.¹

The further question now arises, who are meant by לְבָנַי בְּטָנִי. Perhaps his children? But in the prologue these have utterly perished. Are we to suppose, with Eichhorn and Olshausen, that the poet, in the heat of discourse, forgets what he has laid down in the prologue? When we consider that this poet, within the compass of his work,—a work into which he has thrown his whole soul,—has allowed no anachronism, and no reference to anything Israelitish that is contradictory to its extra-Israelitish character, to escape him, such forgetfulness is very improbable; and when we, moreover, bear in mind that he often makes the friends refer to the destruction of Job's children (as ch. viii. 4, xv. 30, xviii. 16), it is altogether inconceivable. Hence Schröring has proposed the following explanation: "My soul [a substitution of which Hahn is also guilty] is strange to my wife; my entreaty does not even penetrate to the sons of my body, it cannot reach their ear, for they are long since in Sheôl." But he himself thinks this interpretation very hazardous and insecure; and, in fact, it is improbable that in the division, vers. 13-19, where Job complains of the neglect and indifference which he now experiences from those around him, בְּנֵי בָטָי should be the only dead ones among the living, in which case it would moreover be better, after the Arabic version, to translate: "My longing is for, or: I yearn after, the children of my body." Grandchildren (Hirz., Ew., Hlgt., Hahn) might be more readily thought of; but it is not even probable, that after having introduced the ruin of all of Job's children, the poet would represent their children as still living, some mention of whom might then at least be expected in the epilogue. Others, again (Rosenm., Justi, Gleiss), after the precedent of the LXX. (υἱοὶ παλλακίδων μου), understand the sons of concubines (slaves). Where, however, should a trace be found of the poet having conceived of his hero as a polygamist,—a hero who is even a model of chastity and continence (ch. xxxi. 1)?

But must בְּנֵי בָטָי really signify his sons or grandsons?

Children certainly are frequently called, in relation to the father, פרי בטני (e.g. Deut. vii. 13), and the father himself can call them פרי בטני (Mic. vi. 7); but בטן in this reference is not the body of the father, but the mother's womb, whence, begotten by him, the children issue forth. Hence "son of my body" occurs only once (Prov. xxxi. 2) in the mother's mouth. In the mouth of Job even (where the first origin of man is spoken of), בטני signifies not Job's body, but the womb that conceived him (vid. ch. iii. 10); and thus, therefore, it is not merely possible, but it is natural, with Stuhlm., Ges., Umbr., and Schlottm., to understand בני בטני of the sons of his mother's womb, i.e. of her who bare him; consequently, as בני אחי, Ps. lxix. 9, of natural brethren (brothers and sisters, sorores uterine), in which sense, regarding ורחנתי according to the most natural influence of the tone as infin., we transl.: "and my stinking is offensive (supply זרה) to the children of my mother's womb." It is also possible that the expression, as the words seem to be taken by Symmachus (υἱοὺς παιδῶν μου, my slaves' children), and as they are taken by Kosegarten, in comparison with the Arab. بطن in the signification race, subdivision (in the downward gradation, the third) of a greater tribe, may denote those who with him belong in a wider sense to one mother's bosom, i.e. to the same clan, although the mention of בני בטני in close connection with אחתי is not favourable to this extension of the idea. The circle of observation is certainly widened in ver. 18, where עוֹלָם are not Job's grandchildren (Hahn), but the children of neighbouring families and tribes; עוֹלָם (vid. ch. xvi. 11) is a boy, and especially (perh. on account of the similarity in sound between מַעֲיָל and עוֹלָם) a rude, frolicsome, mischievous boy. Even such make him feel their contempt; and if with difficulty, and under the influence of pain which distorts his countenance, he attempts to raise himself (אֶקְוֶמָהּ, LXX. ὅταν ἀναστῶ, hypothetical cohortative, as ch. xi. 17, xvi. 6), they make him the butt of their jesting talk (דַּבֵּר ב', as Ps. l. 20).

Ver. 19. מִתִּי סוֹדִי is the name he gives those to whom he confides his most secret affairs; סוֹד (vid. on Ps. xxv. 14) signifies either with a verbal notion, secret speaking (Arab. sâwada, III. form from sâda, to press one's self close upon, esp. as sârra, to speak in secret with any one), or what is made firm, i.e. what is impenetrable, therefore a secret (from sâda, to be or make close, firm, compact; cognate root, יָסַד, wasada, cognate in signification, sirr, a secret, from sarra, שָׁרַר, which likewise signifies to make firm). Those to whom he has made known his most secret plans (comp. Ps. lv. 13-15) now abhor him; and those whom he has thus (וְהָ, as ch. xv. 17) become attached to, and to whom he has shown his affection,—he says this with an allusion to the three,—have turned against him. They gave tokens of their love and honour to him, when he was in the height of his happiness and prosperity, but they have not once shown any sympathy with him in his present form of distress.¹ His bones cleave (דָּבְקָה, Aq. ἐκολληθή, LXX. erroneously ἐσάπνησαν, i.e. רִקְבָה) to his skin, i.e. the bones may be felt and seen through the skin, and the little flesh that remains is wasted away almost to a skeleton (vid. ch. vii. 15). This is not contradictory to the primary characteristic symptom of the lepra nodosa; for the wasting away of the rest of the body may attain an extraordinarily high degree in connection with the hypertrophy of single parts. He can indeed say of himself, that he is only escaped (se soit échappé) with the skin of his teeth. By the "skin of his teeth" the gums are generally understood. But (1) the gum is not skin, and can therefore not be called "skin of the teeth" in any language; (2) Job complains in ver. 17 of his offensive breath, which in itself does not admit of the idea of healthy gums, and especially if it be the result of a scorbutic ulceration of the mouth, presupposes an ulcerous destruction of the gums. The current translation, "with my gums," is therefore to be rejected on account both of the language and the matter. For this reason Stickel (whom Hahn follows) takes עור as inf. from ערר, and translates: "I am escaped from it with my teeth naked" [lit. with the being naked of my teeth], i.e. with teeth that are no longer covered, standing forward uncovered. This explanation is pathologically satisfactory; but it has against it (1) the translation of עור, which is wide of the most natural interpretation of the word; (2) that in close connection with ואתמלטה one expects the mention of a part of the body that has remained whole. Is there not, then, really a skin of the teeth in the proper sense? The gum is not skin, but the teeth are surrounded with a skin in the jaw, the so-called periosteum. If we suppose, what is natural enough, that his offensive breath, ver. 17, arises from ulcers in the mouth (in connection with scorbutus, as is known, the breath has a terribly offensive smell), we obtain the following picture of Job's disease: his flesh is in part hypertrophically swollen, in part fearfully wasted away; the gums especially are destroyed and wasted away from the teeth, only the periosteum round about the teeth is still left to him, and single remnants of the covering of his loose and projecting teeth. Thus we interpret עור שני in the first signification of the words, and have also no need for supposing that ver. 20b is a proverbial phrase for "I have with great care and difficulty escaped the extreme." The declaration perfectly corresponds to the description of the disease; and it is altogether needless with Hupfeld, after ch. xiii. 14, to read עֹר בְּשֵׁנִי, vitam solam et nudam vix reportari, which is moreover inappropriate, since Job regards himself as one who is dying. Symm. alters the position of the פֶּן similarly, since he translates after the Syriac Hexapla: καὶ ἐξέτιλλον (והלשן) τὸ δέρμα τοῖς ὀδοῦσιν μου, from מֵלֵט = מֵרֵט, הֵלַע, nudare pilis, which J. D. Michaelis also compares; the sense, however, which is thereby gained, is beneath all criticism. On the aoristic וַתִּמְלֹטָה, vid. on ch. i. 15. Stickel has on this passage an excursus on this ah, to which he also attributes, in this addition to the historic tense, the idea of striving after a goal: "I slip away, I escape;" it certainly gives vividness to the notion of the action, though it may not always have the force of direction towards anything. Therefore: with a destroyed flesh, and indeed so completely destroyed that there is even nothing left to him of sound skin except the skin of his teeth, wasted away to a skeleton, and become both to sight and smell a loathsome object;—such is the sufferer the friends have before them,—one who is tortured, besides, by a dark conflict which they only make more severe,—one who now implores them for pity, and because he has no pity to expect from man, presses forward to a hope which reaches beyond the grave.

- 21 *Have pity upon me, have pity upon me, O ye my friends,
For the hand of Eloah hath touched me.*
- 22 *Wherefore do ye persecute me as God,
And are never satisfied with my flesh?*
- 23 Oh that my words were but written,

- That they were recorded in a book,*
 24 With an iron pen, filled in with lead,
Graven in the rock for ever!
 25 And I know : my Redeemer liveth,
And as the last One will He arise upon the dust.

In ver. 21 Job takes up a strain we have not heard previously. His natural strength becomes more and more feeble, and his tone weaker and weaker. It is a feeling of sadness that prevails in the preceding description of suffering, and now even stamps the address to the friends with a tone of importunate entreaty which shall, if possible, affect their heart. They are indeed his friends, as the emphatic רַעִי אֲתָם affirms; impelled towards him by sympathy they are come, and at least stand by him while all other men flee from him. They are therefore to grant him favour (נָחַן, prop. to incline to) in the place of right; it is enough that the hand of Eloah has touched him (in connection with this, one is reminded that leprosy is called נִגַע, and is pre-eminently accounted as plaga divina; wherefore the suffering Messiah also bears the significant name הַנֶּגַע רַבִּי רַבִּי, “the leprous one from the school of Rabbi,” in the Talmud, after Isa. liii. 4, 8), they are not to make the divine decree heavier to him by their uncharitableness. Wherefore do ye persecute me—he asks them in ver. 22—like as God (בְּמוֹאֵל, according to Saad. and Ralbag = כְּמֹרְאֵלָה, which would be very tame); by which he means not merely that they add their persecution to God’s, but that they take upon themselves God’s work, that they usurp to themselves a judicial divine authority, they act towards him as if they were superhuman (vid. Isa. xxxi. 3), and therefore inhumanly, since they, who are but his equals, look down upon him from an assumed and false elevation. The other half of the question: wherefore are ye not full of my flesh (de ma chair, with כֶּנֶן, as ch. xxxi. 31), but still continue to devour it? is founded upon a common Semitic figurative expression, with which may be compared our [Germ.] expression, "to gnaw with the tooth of slander" [comp. Engl. "backbiting"]. In Chaldee, אכל קרצותי רי, to eat the pieces of (any one), is equivalent to, to slander him; in Syriac, ochelqarsso is the name of Satan, like διάβολος. The Arabic here, as almost everywhere in the book of Job, presents a still closer parallel; for أكل لحم signifies to eat any one's flesh, then (different from أكل بشر, Ps. xxvii. 2) equivalent to, to slander,¹ since an evil report is conceived of as a wild beast, which delights in tearing a neighbour to pieces, as the friends do not refrain from doing, since, from the love of their assumption that his suffering must be the retributive punishment of heinous sins, they lay sins to his charge of which he is not conscious, and which he never committed. Against these uncharitable and groundless accusations he wishes (vers. 23 sq.) that the testimony of his innocence, to which they will not listen, might be recorded in a book for posterity, or because a book may easily perish, graven in a rock (therefore not on leaden plates) with an iron style, and the addition of lead, with which to fill up the engraved letters, and render them still more imperishable. In connection with the remarkable fidelity with which the poet throws himself back into the pre-Israelitish patriarchal time of his hero, it is of no small importance that he ascribes to him an acquaintance not only with monumental writing, but also with book and documentary writing (comp. ch. xxxi. 35).

The fut., which also elsewhere (ch. vi. 8, xiii. 5, xiv. 13, once the præt., ch. xxiii. 3, noverim) follows כִּי־יִתֵּן, quis dabit = utinam, has Waw consec. here (as Deut. v. 26 the præt.); the arrangement of the words is extremely elegant, בַּסֵּפֶר stands per hyperbaton emphatically prominent. חֶקֶק and כָּתַב (whence fut. Hoph. יִחַקֵּק with Dag. implicitum in the ח, comp. ch. iv. 20, and the Dag. of the ק omitted, for יִחַקֵּק, according to Ges. § 67, rem. 8) interchange also elsewhere, Isa. xxx. 8. סֵפֶר, according to its etymon, is a book formed of the skin of an animal, as Arab. sufre, the leathern table-mat spread on the ground instead of a table. It is as unnecessary to read לְעַר (comp. ch. xvi. 8, LXX., εἰς μαρτύριον) instead of לְעַר here, as in Isa. xxx. 8. He wishes that his own declaration, in opposition to his accusers, may be inscribed as on a monument, that it may be immortalized,¹ in order that posterity may behold it, and, it is to be hoped, judge him more justly than his cotemporaries. He wishes this, and is certain that his wish is not vain. His testimony to his innocence will not descend to posterity without being justified to it by God, the living God.

Thus is וְאֵנִי יֹדְעָתִי connected with what precedes. יֹדְעָתִי is followed, as in ch. xxx. 23, Ps. ix. 21, by the oratio directa. The monosyllable tone-word חִי (on account of which יֹדְעָתִי has the accent drawn back to the penult.) is 3 præt.: I know: my redeemer liveth; in connection with this we recall the name of God, חִי הָעוֹלָם, Dan. xii. 7, after which the Jewish oath per Anchialum in Martial is to be explained. יֹדְעָתִי might (with Umbr. and others), in comparison with ch. xvi. 18, as Num. xxxv. 12, be equivalent to יֹדְעָתִי הָרֹם: he who will redeem, demand back, avenge the shedding of his blood and maintain his honour as of blood that has been innocently

ahed; in general, however, נָאֵל signifies to procure compensation for the down-trodden and unjustly oppressed, Prov. xxiii. 11, Lam. iii. 58, Ps. cxix. 154. This Rescuer of his honour lives and will rise up as the last One, as one who holds out over everything, and therefore as one who will speak the final decisive word. To אַחֲרֹן have been given the significations Afterman in the sense of vindex (Hirz., Ewald), or Rearman in the sense of a second [lit. in a duel,] (Hahn), but contrary to the usage of the language: the word signifies postremus, novissimus, and is to be understood according to Isa. xlv. 6, xlviii. 12, comp. xli. 4. But what is the meaning of עַל-עָפָר? Is it: upon the dust of the earth, having descended from heaven? The words may, according to ch. xli. 25 [Hebr., Engl. xli. 33], be understood thus (without the accompanying notion, formerly supposed by Umbreit, of pulvis or arena = palæstra, which is Classic, not Hebraic); but looking to the process of destruction going on in his body, which has been previously the subject of his words, and is so further on, it is far more probable that עַל-עָפָר is to be interpreted according to ch. xvii. 16, xx. 11, xxi. 26, Ps. xxx. 10. Moreover, an Arab would think of nothing else but the dust of the grave if he read ^{''}עַלִי תֵרָב in this connection.¹

Besides, it is unnecessary to connect עַל, קוֹם, as perhaps 2 Chron. xxi. 4, and the Arab. قَامَ عَلَى (to stand by, help): עַל-עָפָר is first of all nothing more than a defining of locality. To affirm that if it refer to Job it ought to be עָפָר, is unfounded. Upon the dust in which he is now soon to be laid, into which he is now soon to be changed, will He, the Rescuer of his honour, arise (קם, as in Deut. xix. 15, Ps. xxvii. 12, xxxv. 11, of the rising up of a witness, and as e.g. Ps. xii. 6, comp. xciv. 16, Isa. xxxiii. 10, of the rising up and interposing of a rescuer and help) and set His divine seal to Job's own testimony thus made permanent in the monumental inscription. Oetinger's interpretation is substantially the same: "I know that He will at last come, place himself over the dust in which I have mouldered away, pronounce my cause just, and place upon me the crown of victory."

A somewhat different connection of the thought is obtained, if יָדָע is taken not progressively, but adversatively: "Yet I know," etc. The thought is then, that his testimony of his innocence need not at all be inscribed in the rock; on the contrary, God, the ever living One, will verify it. It is difficult to decide between them; still the progressive rendering seems to be preferable, because the human vindication after death, which is the object of the wish expressed in vers. 23 sq., is still not essentially different from the divine vindication hoped for in ver. 25, which must not be regarded as an antithesis, but rather as a perfecting of the other designed for posterity. Ver. 25 is, however, certainly a higher hope, to which the wish in vers. 23 sq. forms the stepping-stone. God himself will avenge Job's blood, i.e. against his accusers, who say that it is the blood of one who is guilty; over the dust of the departed He will arise, and by His majestic testimony put to silence those who regard this dust of decay as the dust of a sinner, who has received the reward of his deeds.

But is it perhaps this his hope of God's vindication, expressed in vers. 25-27, which (as Schlottmann and Hahn,¹ though in other respects giving very different interpretations, think) is, according to Job's wish, to be permanently inscribed on the monument, in order to testify to posterity with what a steadfast and undismayed conviction he had died? The high-toned introitus, vers. 23 sq., would be worthy of the important inscription it introduces. But (1) it is improbable that the inscription would begin with וְאֵנִי, consequently with Waw,—a difficulty which is not removed by the translation, "Yea, I know," but only covered up; the appeal to Ps. ii. 6, Isa. iii. 14, is inadmissible, since there the divine utterance, which begins with Waw, per aposiopesis continues a suppressed clause; וְאֵנִי would be more admissible, but that which is to be written down does not even begin with וְ in either Hab. ii. 3 or Jer. xxx. 3. (2.) According to the whole of Job's previous conduct and habitual state of mind, it is to be supposed that the contents of the inscription would be the expression of the steadfast consciousness of his innocence, not the hope of his vindication, which only here and there flashes through the darkness of the conflict and temptation, but is always again swallowed up by this darkness, so that the thought of a perpetual preservation, as on a monument, of this hope can by no means have its origin in Job; it forms everywhere only, so to speak, the golden weft of the tragic warp, which in itself consists of the tension of the two opposites: Job's consciousness of innocence, and the dogmatic postulate of the friends; and its intensity gradually increases with the intensity of this very tension. So also here, where the strongest expression is given both to the confession of his innocence as a confession which does not shun, but even desires, to be recorded in a permanent form for posterity, and also at the same time in connection with this to the confidence that to him, who is misunderstood by men, the vindication from the side of God, although it may be so long delayed that he even dies, can nevertheless not be wanting. Accordingly, by מִלִּי we understand not what immediately follows, but the words concerning his innocence which have already been often repeated by him, and which remain unalterably the same; and we are authorized in closing one strophe with ver. 25, and in beginning a new one with ver. 26, which indeed is commended by the prevalence of the decastich in this speech, although we do not allow to this observance of the strophe division any influence in determining the exposition. It is, however, of use in our exposition. The strophe which now follows develops the chief reason of believing hope which is expressed in ver. 25; comp. the hexastich ch. xii. 11–13, also there in vers. 14 sqq. is the expansion of ver. 13, which expresses the chief thought as in the form of a thema.

- 26 *And after my skin, thus torn to pieces,
And without my flesh shall I behold Eloah,*
27 *Whom I shall behold for my good,
And mine eyes shall see Him and no other—
My reins languish in my bosom.*
28 *Ye think: "How shall we persecute him?"
Since the root of the matter is found in me—*
29 *Therefore be ye afraid of the sword,
For wrath meeteth the transgressions of the sword,
That ye may know there is a judgment!*

If we have correctly understood על־עַר, ver. 25b, we cannot in this speech find that the hope of a bodily recovery is expressed. In connection with this rendering, the oldest representative of which is Chrysostom, מִבְּשָׁרִי is translated either: free from my flesh = having become a skeleton (Umbr., Hirz., and Stickel, in comm. in Iobi loc. de Goële, 1832, and in the transl., Gleiss, Hlgst., Renan), but this מִבְּשָׁרִי, if the מן is taken as privative, can signify nothing else but fleshless = bodiless; or: from my flesh, i.e. the flesh when made whole again (viz. Eichhorn in the Essay, which has exercised considerable influence, to his Allg. Bibl. d. bibl. Lit. i. 3, 1787, von Cölln, BCr., Knapp, von Hofm.,¹ and others), but hereby the relation of ver. 26*b* to 26*a* becomes a contrast, without there being anything to indicate it. Moreover, this rendering, however מִבְּשָׁרִי may be explained, is in itself contrary to the spirit and plan of the book; for the character of Job's present state of mind is, that he looks for certain death, and will hear nothing of the consolation of recovery (ch. xvii. 10-16), which sounds to him as mere mockery; that he, however, notwithstanding, does not despair of God, but, by the consciousness of his innocence and the uncharitableness of the friends, is more and more impelled from the God of wrath and caprice to the God of love, his future Redeemer; and that then, when at the end of the course of suffering the actual proof of God's love breaks through the seeming manifestation of wrath, even that which Job had not ventured to hope is realized: a return of temporal prosperity beyond his entreaty and comprehension.

On the other hand, the mode of interpretation of the older translators and expositors, who find an expression of the hope of a resurrection at the end of the preceding strophe or the beginning of this, cannot be accepted. The LXX., by reading יָקִים instead of יָקוּם, and connecting יָקִים עוֹרִי נִקְפוּ זֶאת, translates: ἀναστήσει δέ (Cod. Vat. only ἀναστήσῃ) μου τὸ σῶμα (Cod. Vat. τὸ δέρμα μου) τὸ ἀναντλοῦν μοι (Cod. Vat. om. μοι) ταῦτα, —but how can any one's skin be said to awake (Italic: super terram resurget cutis mea),² and whence does the verb נִקָּה obtain

² Stickel therefore maintains that this ἀνίστασθαι of the LXX. is to be the signification exhaurire or exantlare? Jerome's translation is not less bold: Scio enim quod redemptor meus vivit et in novissimo die de terra surrecturus sum, as though it were אָקום, not יָקום, and as though אֶחָרִית could signify in novissimo die (in favour of which Isa. viii. 23 can only seemingly be quoted)! The Targ. translates: "I know that my Redeemer liveth, and hereafter His redemption will arise (become a reality) over the dust (into which I shall be dissolved), and after my skin is again made whole (thus¹ אֶתְפַּח seems to require to be translated, not intumuit) this will happen; and from my flesh I shall again behold God." It is evident that this is intended of a future restoration of the corporeal nature that has become dust, but the idea assigned to נָקַפִּי is without foundation. Luther also cuts the knot by translating: (But I know that my Redeemer liveth), and He will hereafter raise me up out of the ground, which is an impossible sense that is word for word forced upon the text. There is just as little ground for translating ver. 26a with Jerome: et rursum circumdabor pelle mea (after which Luther: and shall then be surrounded with this my skin); for נָקַפִּי can as Niph. not signify circumdabor, and as Piel does not give the meaning cutis mea circumdabit (scil. me), since נָקַפִּי cannot be predicate to the sing. עוֹרִי. In general, נָקַפִּי cannot be understood as Niph., but only as Piel; the Piel נִקַּף, however, signifies not: to surround, but: to strike down, e.g. olives from the tree, Isa. xvii. 6, or the trees themselves, so that they lie felled on the ground, Isa. x. 34, comp. נָקַף, to strike into the skull and injure the soft brain, then: to strike forcibly on the head (gen. on the upper part), or also: to deal a blow with a lance understood not of being raised from the dead, but of being restored to health; vid. on the contrary, Umbreit in Stud. u. Krit. 1840, i., and Ewald in d. Theol. Jahrb., 1843, iv.

or stick.¹ Therefore ver. 26*a*, according to the usage of the Semitic languages, can only be intended of the complete destruction of the skin, which is become cracked and broken by the leprosy; and this was, moreover, the subject spoken of above (ver. 20, comp. xxx. 19). For the present we leave it undecided whether Job here confesses the hope of the resurrection, and only repel those forced misconstructions of his words which arbitrarily discern this hope in the text. Free from such violence is the translation: and after this my skin is destroyed, i.e. after I shall have put off this my body, from my flesh (i.e. restored and transfigured), I shall behold God. Thus is מְבֹשֵׁר understood by Rosenm., Kosegarten (diss. in Job, xix., 1815), Umbreit (Stud. u. Krit. 1840, i.), Welte, Carey, and others. But this interpretation is also untenable. For, 1. In this explanation ver. 26*a* is taken as an antecedent; a præpos., however, like אֲחֵר or עַר, used as a conj., has, according to Hirzel's correct remark, the verb always immediately after it, as ch. xlii. 7, Lev. xiv. 43; whereas 1 Sam. xx. 41, the single exception, is critically doubtful. 2. It is not probable that the poet by עָרִי should have thought of the body, which disease is rapidly hurrying on to death, and by בְּשָׂרִי, on the other hand, of a body raised up and glorified. 3. Still more improbable is it that בֶּשֶׂר should be so used here as in the church's term, resurrectio carnis, which is certainly an allowable expression, but one which exceeds the meaning of the language of Scripture. בֶּשֶׂר, σάρξ, is in general, and especially in the Old Testament, a notion which has grown up in almost inseparable connection with the marks of frailty and sinfulness. And 4. The hope of a resurrection as a settled principle in the creed of Israel is certainly more recent than the Salomonic period. Therefore by far the majority of modern expositors have decided that Job does not indeed here avow the hope of the resurrection, but the hope of a future spiritual beholding of God, and therefore of a future life; and thus the popular idea of Hades, which elsewhere has sway over him, breaks out. Thus, of a future spiritual beholding of God, are Job's words understood by Ewald, Umbreit (who at first explained them differently), Vaihinger, Von Gerlach, Schlottmann, Hölemann (Sächs. Kirchen- u. Schulbl. 1853, Nos. 48, 50, 62), König (Die Unsterblichkeitsidee im B. Job, 1855), and others, also by the Jewish expositors Arnheim and Löwenthal. This rendering, which is also adopted in the Art. Hiob in Herzog's Real-Encyclopädie, does not necessitate any impossible misconstruction of the language, but, as we shall see further on, it does not exhaust the meaning of Job's confession.

First of all, we will continue the explanation of each expression. אַחֲרֵי is a præpos., and used in the same way as the Arabic ^{بعد} is sometimes used: after my skin, i.e. after the loss of it (comp. ch. xxi. 21, אַחֲרָיו, after he is dead). נִקְפוּ is to be understood relatively: which they have torn in pieces, i.e. which has been torn in pieces (comp. the same use of the 3 pers., ch. iv. 19, xviii. 18); and וְזֹאת, which, according to Targ., Koseg., Stickel de Goële, and Ges. Thes., ought to be taken inferentially, equivalent to hoc erit (this, however, cannot be accepted, because it must have been וְזֹאת אַחֲרֵי וְנִקְפוּ, וְזֹאת אַחֲרֵי וְנִקְפוּ, idque postquam, and moreover would require the words to be arranged אַחֲרֵי נִקְפוּ עוֹרִי), commonly however taken together with עוֹרִי (which is nevertheless masc.), is understood as pointing to his decayed body, seems better to be taken adverbially: in this manner (Arnheim, Stickel in his translation, von Gerl., Hahn); it is the acc. of reference, as ch. xxxiii. 12. The מן of מִבְּשָׁרִי is the negative מן: free from my flesh (prop. away, far from, Num. xv. 25, Prov. xx. 3),—a rather frequent way of using this preposition (vid. ch. xi. 15, xxi. 9; Gen. xxvii. 39; 2 Sam. i. 22; Jer. xlviii. 45). Accordingly, we translate: “and after my skin, which they tear to pieces thus, and free from my flesh, shall I behold Eloah.” That Job, after all, is permitted to behold God in this life, and also in this life receives the testimony of his justification, does not, as already observed, form any objection to this rendering of ver. 26: it is the reward of his faith, which, even in the face of certain death, has not despaired of God, that he does not fall into the power of death at all, and that God forthwith condescends to him in love. And that Job here holds firm, even beyond death, to the hope of beholding God in the future as a witness to his innocence, does not, after ch. xiv. 13-15, xvi. 18-21, come unexpectedly; and it is entirely in accordance with the inner progress of the drama, that the thought of a redemption from Hades, expressed in the former passage, and the demand expressed in the latter passage, for the rescue of the honour of his blood, which is even now guaranteed him by his witness in heaven, are here comprehended in the confident certainty that his blood and his dust will not be declared by God the Redeemer as innocent, without his being in some way conscious of it, though freed from this his decaying body. In ver. 27 he declares how he will behold God: whom I shall behold to me, i.e. I, the deceased one, as being for me (לִי, like Ps. lvi. 10, cxviii. 6), and my eyes see Him, and not a stranger. Thus (neque alius) LXX., Targ., Jerome, and most others translate; on the other hand, Ges. Thes., Umbr., Vaih., Stick., Hahn, and von Hofm. translate: my eyes see Him, and indeed not as an enemy; but רִי signifies alienus and alius, not however adversarius, which latter meaning it in general obtains only in a national connection ; here (used as in Prov. xxvii. 2) it excludes the three : none other but Job, by which he means his opponents, will see God rising up for him, taking up his cause. יָאֵל is præt. of the future, therefore præt. propheticum, or præt. confidentiæ (as frequently in the Psalms). His reins within him pine after this vision of God. Hahn, referring to ch. xvi. 13, translates incorrectly : “ If even my reins within me perish,” which is impossible, according to the syntax ; for Ps. lxxiii. 26 has בָּלָה in the sense of licet defecerit as hypothetical antecedent. The Syriac version is altogether wrong : my reins (culjot) vanish completely away by reason of my lot (בְּחֶלְקִי). It would be expressed in Arabic exactly as it is here : culāja (or, dual, culatāja) tadhûbu, my reins melt ; for in Arab. also, as in the Semitic languages generally, the reins are considered as the seat of the tenderest and deepest affections (Psychol. p. 316 sq.), especially of love, desire, longing, as here, where בָּלָה, as in Ps. cxix. 123 and freq., is intended of wasting away in earnest longing for salvation.

Having now ended the exposition of the single expressions, we inquire whether those do justice to the text who understand it of an absolutely bodiless future beholding of God. We doubt it. Job says not merely that he, but that his eyes, shall behold God. He therefore imagines the spirit as clothed with a new spiritual body instead of the old decayed one ; not so, however, that this spiritual body, these eyes which shall behold in the future world, are brought into combination with the present decaying body of flesh. But his faith is here on the direct road to the hope of a resurrection ; we see it germinating and struggling towards the light. Among the three pearls which become visible in the book of Job above the waves of conflict, viz. ch. xiv. 13–15, xvi. 18–21, xix. 25–27, there is none more costly than this third. As in the second part of Isaiah, the fifty-third chapter is outwardly and inwardly the middle and highest point of the 3 X 9 prophetic utterances, so the poet of the book of Job has adorned the middle of his work with this confession of his hero, wherein he himself plants the flag of victory above his own grave.

Now in ver. 28 Job turns towards the friends. He who comes forth on his side as his advocate, will make Himself felt by them to be a judge, if they continue to persecute the suffering servant of God (comp. ch. xiii. 10-12). It is not to be translated: for then ye will say, or: forsooth then will ye say. This would be כִּי אָז תֹּאמְרוּ, and certainly imply that the opponents will experience just the same theophany, that therefore it will be on the earth. Oehler (in his Veteris Test. sententia de rebus post mortem futuris, 1846) maintains this instance against the interpretation of this confession of Job of a future beholding; it has, however, no place in the text, and Oehler rightly gives no decisive conclusion.¹ For ver 28, as is rightly observed by C. W. G. Köstlin (in his Essay, de immortalitatis spe, quæ in l. Iobi apparere dicitur, 1846) against Oehler, and is even explained by Oetinger, is the antecedent to ver. 29 (comp. ch. xxi. 28 sq.): if ye say: how, i.e. under what pretence of right, shall we prosecute him (נִדְּרֶהֱלֹ, prop. pursue him, comp. Judg. vii. 25), and (so that) the root of the matter (treated of) is found in me (בִּי, not בּוֹ, since the oratio directa, as in ch. xxii. 17, passes into the oratio obliqua, Ew. § 338, a); in other words: if ye continue to seek the cause of my suffering in my guilt, fear ye the sword, i.e. God's sword of vengeance (as ch. xv. 22, and perhaps as Isa. xxxi. 8: a sword, without the art. in order to combine the idea of what is boundless, endless, and terrific with the indefinite—the indetermination ad amplificandum described on Ps. ii. 12). The confirmatory substantival clause which follows has been very variously interpreted. It is inadmissible to understand הַטָּה of the rage of the friends against Job (Umbr., Schlottm., and others), or עֲוֹנוֹת הָרֵב of their murderous sinning respecting Job; both expressions are too strong to be referred to the friends. We must explain either: the glow, i.e. the glow of the wrath of God, are the expiations which the sword imposes (Hirz., Ew., and others); but apart from עָן not signifying directly the punishment of sin, this thought is strained; or, which we with Rosenm. and others prefer: glow, i.e. the glow of the wrath of God, are the sword's crimes, i.e. they carry glowing anger as their reward in themselves, wrath overtakes them. Crimes of the sword are not such as are committed with the sword—for such are not treated of here, and, with Arnh. and Hahn, to understand הָרֵב of the sword “of hostilely mocking words,” is arbitrary and artificial—but such as have incurred the sword. Job thinks of slander and blasphemy. These are even before a human tribunal capital offences (comp. ch. xxxi. 11, 28). He warns the friends of a higher sword and a higher power, which they will not escape: “that ye may know it.” שִׁדִּי, for which the Keri is שִׁדִּי. An ancient various reading (in Pinsker) is יִדְעֵן (instead of יִדְעֵן). The LXX. shows how it is to be interpreted: θυμὸς γὰρ ἐπ’ ἀνόμους (Cod. Alex. —ois) ἐπελεύσεται, καὶ τότε γνώσονται. According to Cod. Vat. the translation continues ποῦ ἔστιν αὐτῶν ἡ ὕλη (יִדִּי, comp. ch. xxix. 5, where שִׁדִּי is translated by ὕλῳδης); according to Cod. Alex. ὅτι οὐδαμοῦ αὐτῶν ἡ ἰσχύς ἐστίν (יִדִּי from שִׁדִּי). Ewald in the first edition, whom Hahn follows, considers, as Eichhorn already had, שִׁדִּי as a secondary form of שִׁדִּי; Hlgst. wishes to read שִׁדִּי at once. It might sooner, with Raschi, be explained: that ye might only know the powers of justice, i.e. the manifold power of destruction which the judge has at his disposal. But all these explanations are unsupported by the usage of the language, and Ewald's conjecture in his second edition : אֵי שְׂדָדְכֶם (where is your violence), has nothing to commend it; it goes too far from the received text, calls the error of the friends by an unsuitable name, and gives no impressive termination to the speech. On the other hand, the speech could not end more suitably than by Job's bringing home to the friends the fact that there is a judgment; accordingly it is translated by Aq. ὅτι κρίσις; by Symm., Theod., ὅτι ἔσται κρίσις. ש is = אשר once in the book of Job, as probably also once in the Pentateuch, Gen. vi. 3. יִן or יָן are infinitive forms; the latter from the Kal, which occurs only in Gen. vi. 3, with Cholem, which being made a substantive (as e.g. בִּינוּ), signifies the judging, the judgment. Why the Keri substitutes יָן, which does not occur elsewhere in the signification judicium, for the more common יִן, is certainly lost to view, and it shows only that the reading שְׂדָדְכֶם was regarded in the synagogue as the traditional. יָן has everywhere else the signification judicium, e.g. by Elihu, ch. xxxvi. 17, and also often in the book of Proverbs, e.g. ch. xx. 8 (comp. in the Arabizing supplement, ch. xxxi. 8). The final judgment is in Aramaic יָנָא רַבָּא; the last day in Hebrew and Arabic, יּוֹם הַדִּין, jaum ed-dîn. To give to "שְׂדָדְכֶם, that [there is] a judgment," this dogmatically definite meaning, is indeed, from its connection with the historical recognition of the plan of redemption, inadmissible; but there is nothing against understanding the conclusion of Job's speech according to the conclusion of the book of Ecclesiastes, which belongs to the same age of literature.

The speech of Job, now explained, most clearly shows us how Job's affliction, interpreted by the friends as a divine retribution, becomes for Job's nature a wholesome refining crucible. We see also from this speech of Job, that he can only regard his affliction as a kindling of divine wrath, and God's meeting him as an enemy (ch. xix. 11). But the more decidedly the friends affirm this, and describe the root of the manifestation as lying in himself, in his own transgression ; and the more uncharitably, as we have seen it at last in Bildad's speech, they go to an excess in their terrible representations of the fate of the ungodly with unmistakeable reference to him : the more clearly is it seen that this indirect affliction of misconstruction must tend to help him in his suffering generally to the right relation towards God. For since the consolation expected from man is changed into still more cutting accusation, no other consolation remains to him in all the world but the consolation of God ; and if the friends are to be in the right when they persist unceasingly in demonstrating to him that he must be a heinous sinner, because he is suffering so severely, the conclusion is forced upon him in connection with his consciousness of innocence, that the divine decree is an unjust one (ch. xix. 5 sq.). From such a conclusion, however, he must shrink back ; and this produces a twofold result. The crushing anguish of soul which the friends inflict on him, by forcing upon him a view of his suffering which is as strongly opposed to his self-consciousness as to his idea of God, and must therefore bring him into the extremest difficulty of conscience, drives him to the mournful request, "Have pity upon, have pity upon me, O ye my friends" (ch. xix. 21) ; they shall not also pursue him whom God's hand has touched, as if they were a second divine power in authority over him, that could dispose of him at its will and pleasure ; they shall, moreover, cease from satisfying the insatiable greed of their nature upon him. He treats the friends in the right manner ; so that if their heart were not encrusted by their dogma, they would be obliged to change their opinion. This in Job's conduct is an unmistakeable step forward to a more spiritual state of mind. But the stern inference of the friends has a beneficial influence not merely on his relation to them, but also on his relation to God. To the wrathful God, whom they compel him to regard also as unjust, he cannot in itself cling. He is so much the less able to do this, as he is compelled the more earnestly to long for vindication, the more confidently he is accused.

When he now wishes that the testimony which he has laid down concerning his innocence, and which his cotemporaries do not credit, might be graven in the rock with an iron pen, and filled in with lead, the memorial in words of stone is but a dead witness; and he cannot even for the future rely on men, since he is so contemptuously misunderstood and deceived by them in the present. This impels his longing after vindication forward from a lifeless thing to a living person, and turns his longing from man below to God above. He has One who will acknowledge his misjudged cause, and set it right,—a Goël, who will not first come into being in a later generation, but liveth—who has not to come into being, but is. There can be no doubt that by the words נֹאֵל ה' he means the same person of whom in ch. xvi. 19 he says: "Behold, even now in heaven is my Witness, and One who acknowledges me is in the heights." The ה' here corresponds to the עֵתָהּ in that passage; and from this—that the heights of heaven is the place where this witness dwells—is to be explained the manner in which Job (ch. xix. 25*b*) expresses his confident belief in the realization of that which he (ch. xvi. 20 sq.) at first only importunately implores: as the Last One, whose word shall avail in the ages of eternity, when the strife of human voices shall have long been silent, He shall stand forth as finally decisive witness over the dust, into which Job has passed away as one who in the eye of man was regarded as an object of divine punishment. And after his skin, in such a manner destroyed, and free from his flesh, which is even now already so fallen in that the bones may be seen through it (ch. xix. 20), he will behold Eloah; and he who, according to human judgment, has died the death of the unrighteous, shall behold Eloah on his side, his eyes shall see and not a stranger; for entirely for his profit, in order that he may bask in the light of His countenance, will He reveal himself.

This is the picture of the future, for the realization of which Job longs so exceedingly, that his reins within him pine away with longing. Whence we see, that Job does not here give utterance to a transient emotional feeling, a merely momentary flight of faith; but his hidden faith, which during the whole controversy rests at the bottom of his soul, and over which the waves of despair roll away, here comes forth to view. He knows, that although his outward man may decay, God cannot, however, fail to acknowledge his inner man. But does this confidence of faith of Job really extend to the future life? It has, on the contrary, been observed, that if the hope expressed with such confidence were a hope respecting the future life, Job's despondency would be trifling, and to be rejected; further, that this hope stands in contradiction to his own assertion, ch. xiv. 14: "If man dies, shall he live again? All the days of my warfare would I wait, till my change should come;" thirdly, that Job's character would be altogether wrongly drawn, and would be a psychological caricature, if the thought slumbering in Job's mind, which finds utterance in ch. xix. 25-27, were the thought of a future vision of God; and finally, that the unravelling of the knot of the puzzle, which continually increases in entanglement by the controversy with the friends, at the close of the drama, is effected by a theophany, which issues in favour of one still living, not, as ought to be expected by that rendering, a celestial scene unveiled over the grave of Job. But such a conclusion was impossible in an Old Testament book. The Old Testament as yet knew nothing of a heaven peopled with happy human spirits, arrayed in white robes (the stola prima). And at the time when the book of Job was composed, there was also neither a positive revelation nor a dogmatic confession of the resurrection of the dead, which forms the boundary of the course of this world, in existence. The book of Job, however, shows us how, from the conflict concerning the mystery of this present life, faith struggled forth towards a future solution. The hope which Job expresses is not one prevailing in his age—not one that has come to him from tradition—not one embracing mankind, or even only the righteous in general. All the above objections would be really applicable, if it were evident here that Job was acquainted with the doctrine of a beholding of God after death, which should recompense the pious for the sufferings of this present time. But such is not the case. The hope expressed is not a finished and believingly appropriating hope; on the contrary, it is a hope which is first conceived and begotten under the pressure of divinely decreed sufferings, which make him appear to be a transgressor, and of human accusations which charge him with transgression. It is impossible for him to suppose that God should remain, as now, so hostilely turned from him, without ever again acknowledging him. The truth must at last break through the false appearance, and wrath again give place to love. That it should take place after his death, is only the extreme which his faith assigns to it.

If we place ourselves on the standpoint of the poet, he certainly here gives utterance to a confession, to which, as the book of Proverbs also shows, the Salomonic Chokma began to rise in the course of believing thought; but also on the part of the Chokma, this confession was primarily only a theologoumenon, and was first in the course of centuries made sure under the combined agency of the progressive perception and revelation and facts connected with redemption; and it is first of all in the New Testament, by the descent to Hades and the ascension to Heaven of the Prince of Life, that it became a fully decided and well-defined element of the church's creed. If, however, we place ourselves on the standpoint of the hero of the drama, this hope of future vindication which flashes through the fierceness of the conflict, far from making it a caricature,¹ gives to the delineation of his faith, which does not forsake God, the final perfecting stroke. Job is, as he thinks, meeting certain death. Why then should not the poet allow him to give utterance to that demand of faith, that he, even if God should permit him apparently to die the sinner's death, nevertheless cannot remain unvindicated? Why should he not allow him here, in the middle of the drama, to rise from the thought, that the cry of his blood should not ascend in vain, to the thought that this vindication of his blood, as of one who is innocent, should not take place without his being consciously present, and beholding with his own eyes the God by whose judicial wrath he is overwhelmed, as his Redeemer? This hope, regarded in the light of the later perception of the plan of redemption, is none other than the hope of a resurrection; but it appears here only in the germ, and comes forward as purely personal: Job rises from the dust, and, after the storm of wrath is passed, sees Eloah, as one who acknowledges him in love, while his surviving opponents fall before the tribunal of this very God. It is therefore not a share in the resurrection of the righteous (in Isa. xxvi., which is uttered prophetically, but first of all nationally), and not a share in the general resurrection of the dead (first expressed in Dan. xii. 2), with which Job consoled himself; he does not speak of what shall happen at the end of the days, but of a purely personal matter after his death. Considering himself as one who must die, and thinking of himself as deceased, and indeed, according to appearance, overwhelmed by the punishment of his misdeeds, he would be compelled to despair of God, if he were not willing to regard even the incredible as unfailing, this, viz., that God will not permit this mark of wrath and of false accusation to attach to his blood and dust. That the conclusion of the drama should be shaped in accordance with this future hope, is, as we have already observed, not possible, because the poet (apart from his patriarchal hero) was not yet in possession, as a dogma, of that hope which Job gives utterance to as an aspiration of his faith, and which even he himself only at first, like the psalmists (vid. on Ps. xvii. 15, xlix. 15 sq., lxxiii. 26), had as an aspiration of faith;¹ it was, however, also entirely unnecessary, since it is indeed not the idea of the drama that there is a life after death, which adjusts the mystery of the present, but that there is a suffering of the righteous which bears the disguise of wrath, but nevertheless, as is finally manifest, is a dispensation of love.

If, however, it is a germinating hope, which in this speech of Job is urged forth by the strength of his faith, we can, without anachronistically confusing the different periods of the development of the knowledge of redemption, regard it as a full, but certainly only developing, preformation of the later belief in the resurrection. When Job says that with his own eyes he shall behold Eloah, it is indeed possible by these eyes to understand the eyes of the spirit;² but it is just as possible to understand him to mean the eyes of his renewed body (which the old theologians describe as stola secunda, in distinction from the stola prima of the intermediate state); and when Job thinks of him-

² Job's wish, ch. xix. 23 sq., is accomplished, as e.g. James v. 11 shows, and his hope is realized, since he has beheld God the Redeemer enter Hades, and is by Him led up on high to behold God in heaven. We self (ver. 25*b*) as a mouldering corpse, should he not by his eyes, which shall behold Eloah, mean those which have been dimmed in death, and are now again become capable of seeing? While, if we wish to expound grammatico-historically, not practically, not homiletically, we also dare not carry back the definiteness of the later dogma into the affirmation of Job. It is related to eschatology as the protevangelium is to soteriology; it presents only the first lines of the picture, which is worked up in detail later on, but also an outline, sketched in such a way that every later perception may be added to it. Hence Schlottmann is perfectly correct when he considers that it is justifiable to understand these grand and powerful words, in hymns, and compositions, and liturgies, and monumental inscriptions, of the God-man, and to use them in the sense which "the more richly developed conception of the last things might so easily put upon them." It must not surprise us that this sublime hope is not again expressed further on. On the one hand, what Sanctius remarks is not untrue: ab hoc loco ad finem usque libri aliter se habet Iobus quam prius; on the other hand, Job here, indeed in the middle of the book, soars triumphantly over his opponents to the height of a believing consciousness of victory, but as yet he is not in that state of mind in which he can attain to the beholding of God on his behalf, be it in this world or in the world to come. He has still further to learn submission in relation to God, gentleness in relation to the friends. Hence, inexhaustibly rich in thought and variations of thought, the poet allows the controversy to become more and more involved, and the fire in which Job is to be proved, but also purified, to burn still longer.

assume the historical reality of Job and the consistence of his history with the rest of Scripture, which we have treated in Bibl. Psychol. ch. vi. § 3, on the future life and redemption. Accordingly, one might, with the majority of modern expositors, limit Job's hope to the beholding of God in the intermediate state; but, as is further said above, such particularizing is unauthorized.

Zophar's Second Speech.—Chap. xx.Schema : 8. 12. 10. 8. 12. 7. 2.

[Then began Zophar the Naamathite, and said:]

- 2 *Therefore do my thoughts furnish me with a reply,
And indeed by reason of my feeling within me.*
- 3 *The correction of my reproach I must hear,
Nevertheless the spirit of my understanding informeth me.*
- 4 *Knowest thou this which is from everlasting,
Since man was placed upon the earth :*
- 5 *That the triumphing of the evil-doer is not long,
And the joy of the godless is but for a moment ?*

All modern expositors take ver. 2 as an apology for the opposition which follows, and the majority of them consider בְּעֵבֹר as elliptical for בְּעֵבֹר זֹאת, as Tremell., Piscator, and others have done, partly (but wrongly) by referring to the Rebia mugrasch. Ewald observes: “בְּעֵבֹר stands without addition, because this is easily understood from the לִבִּי in כֵּן.” But although this ellipsis is not inadmissible (comp. לִבִּי = לִבִּי אִשֶּׁר, ch. xxxiv. 25 ; בַּעַל, Isa. lix. 18), in spite of it ver. 2b furnishes no meaning that can be accepted. Most expositors translate: “and hence the storming within me” (thus e.g. Ewald); but the signification perturbatio animi, proposed by Schultens for חִזְשִׁי, after the Arab. حاش, is too remote from the usage of Hebrew. Moreover, this حاش signifies prop. to scare, hunt, of game; not, however: to be agitated, to storm, —a signification which even the corresponding Hebr. חִזְשִׁי, properare, does not support. Only a few expositors (as Umbreit, who translates: because of my storm within me) take בְּעֵבֹר (which occurs only this once in the book of Job) as præpos., as it must be taken in consideration of the infin. which follows (comp. Ex. ix. 16, xx. 20; 1 Sam. i. 6; 2 Sam. x. 3). Further, לִבִּי (only by Umbreit translated by “yet,” after the Arab. lākin, lākinna, which it never signifies in Hebr., where לָּ is not = לָּ, but = לָּ with Kametz before the tone) with that which follows is referred by several expositors to the preceding speech of Job, e.g. Hahn: “under such circumstances, if thou behavest thus;” by most, however, it is referred to ver. 3, e.g. Ew.: “On this account he feels called upon by his thoughts to answer, and hence his inward impulse leaves him no rest: because he hears from Job a contemptuous wounding reproof of himself.” In other words: in consequence of the reproach which Job casts upon him, especially with his threat of judgment, Zophar’s mind and feelings fall into a state of excitement, and give him an answer to which he now gives utterance. This prospective sense of לָּבֵן may at any rate be retained, though בְּעִבּוֹר is taken as a preposition (wherefore . . . and indeed on account of my inward commotion); but it is far more natural that the beginning of Zophar’s speech should be connected with the last word of Job’s. Ver. 2 may really be so understood if we connect חֲשִׁי, not with חָשׂ, חָשׂ, to excite, to make haste (after which also Saad. and Aben-Ezra: on account of my inward hastening or urging), but with חָשׂ, to feel; in this meaning חָשׂ is usual in all the Semitic dialects, and is even biblical also; for Eccles. ii. 25 is to be translated: who hath feeling (pleasure) except from Him (read מִמֶּנִּי)? i.e. even in pleasure man is not free, but has conditions fixed by God.

With לָּבֵן (used as in ch. xlii. 3) Zophar draws an inference from Job’s conduct, esp. from the turn which his last speech has taken, which, as שְׁעִיפִי יִשְׁבִּינִי¹ affirms, urges him involuntarily and irresistibly forward, and indeed, as he adds with ¹ Thus it is to be read according to the Masoretic note, לֵית וּמְלֵא (i.e. plene, as nowhere else), which occurs in Codd., as is also attested by Kimchi in his Gramm., Moznajim, p. 8; Aben-Ezra in his Gramm., Zachoth 1, b; and the punctuator Jekuthiël, in his Darche ha-Nikkud (chapter on the letters יְהוָה).

Wav explic.: on account of the power of feeling dwelling in him, by which he means both his sense of truth and his moral feeling, in general the capacity of direct perception, not perception that is only attained after long reflection. On שְׁעֵפִי, of thoughts which, as it were, branch out, vid. on ch. iv. 13, and Psychol. p. 214. הָשִׁיב signifies, as everywhere, to answer, not causative, to compel to answer. חוֹשֵׁי is n. actionis in the sense of רְגִישָׁתִי (Targ.), or הרגיש (Ralbag), which also signifies “my feeling (αἰσθησις),” and the combination חוֹשֵׁי בִי is like ch. iv. 21, vi. 13. Wherein the inference consists is self-evident, and proceeds from vers. 4 sq. In ver. 3 expression is given to the ground of the conclusion intended in לִבִּי: the chastisement of my dishonour, i.e. which tends to my dishonour (comp. Isa. liii. 5, chastisement which conduces to our peace), I must hear (comp. on this modal signification of the future, e.g. ch. xvii. 2); and in ver. 3b Zophar repeats what he has said in ver. 2, only somewhat differently applied: the spirit, this inner light (vid. ch. xxxii. 8; Psychol. p. 182sq.), answers him from the perception which is peculiar to himself, i.e. out of the fulness of this perception it furnishes him with information as to what is to be thought of Job with his insulting attacks, viz. (this is the substance of the הָשִׁיב of the thoughts, and of the עֲנוֹת of the spirit), that in this conduct of Job only his godlessness is manifest. This is what he warningly brings against him, vers. 4 sq.: knowest thou indeed (which, according to ch. xli. 1, 1 Kings xxi. 19, sarcastically is equivalent to: thou surely knowest, or in astonishment: what! dost thou not know?!) this from the beginning, i.e. this law, which has been in operation from time immemorial (or as Ew.: hoccine scis æternum esse, so that מִנִּי-עַד is not a virtual adj., but virtual predicate-acc.), since man was placed (שָׂם infin., therefore prop., since one has placed man) upon the earth (comp. the model passage, Deut. iv. 32), that the exulting of the wicked is מִקְרֹב, from near, i.e. not extending far, enduring only a short time (Arab. قریب often directly signifies brevis); and the joy of the godless עֲדִי-רֵנֶּה, only for a moment, and continuing no longer?

- 6 *If his aspiration riseth to the heavens,
And he causeth his head to touch the clouds :*
- 7 *Like his dung he perisheth for ever ;
Those who see him say : Where is he ?*
- 8 *As a dream he flieth away, and they cannot find him ;
And he is scared away as a vision of the night.*
- 9 *The eye hath seen him, and never again,
And his place beholdeth him no more.*
- 10 *His children must appease the poor,
And his hands give up his wealth.*
- 11 *His bones were full of youthful vigour ;
Now it is laid down with him in the dust.*

If the exaltation of the evil-doer rises to heaven, and he causes his head to reach to the clouds, i.e. to touch the clouds, he notwithstanding perishes like his own dung. We are here reminded of what Obadiah, ver. 4, says of Edom, and Isaiah, ch. xiv. 13–15, says of the king of Babylon. שָׂא is equivalent to נָשָׂא, like שָׂא, Ps. lxxxix. 10 = נָשָׂא; the first weak radical is cast away, as in נָבִילִי = בִּילִי, fraudulentus, machinator, Isa. xxxii. 5, and according to Olsh. in שִׁבָּה = שִׁבָּה, 2 Sam. xix. 33. הִנִּיעַ is to be understood as causative (at least this is the most natural) in the same manner as in Isa. xxv. 12, and freq. It is unnecessary, with Ew., Hirz., and Hlgst., after Schultens, to transl. בגללו, ver. 7a, according to the Arab. جلال (whence the name Gelâl-ed-dîn): secundum majestatem suam, or with Reiske to read בגללו, in magnificentia sua, and it is very hazardous, since the Hebrew גלל has not the meaning of جَلَّ, illustrem esse. Even Schultens, in his Commentary, has retracted the explanation commended in his Animadv., and maintained the correctness of the translation, sicut stercus suum (Jer. sicut sterquilinum), which is also favoured by the similar figurative words in 1 Kings xiv. 10: as one burneth up (not: brushes away) dung (הַלֵּל), probably cow-dung as fuel, until it is completely gone. הַלֵּל (or הַלֵּל with an audible Sh'vâ) may be derived from הַלֵּל, but the analogy of הַלֵּל favours the primary form הַלֵּל (Ew. § 255, b); on no account is it הַלֵּל. The word is not low, as Ezek. iv. 12, comp. Zeph. i. 17, shows, and the figure, though revolting, is still very expressive; and how the fulfilment is to be thought of may be seen from an example from 2 Kings ix. 37, according to which, "as dung upon the face of the field shall it be, so that they cannot say: this is Jezebel."¹ The continuation here, ver. 7b,

is just the same: they who saw him (partic. of what is past, Ges. § 134, 1) say: where is he? As a dream he flieth away, so that he is not found, and is scared away (יָדָר Hoph., not יָדַר Kal) as a vision of the night (חֲזִיוֹן everywhere in the book of Job instead of חִזיוֹן, from which it perhaps differs, as visum from visio), which one banishes on waking as a trick of his fancy (comp. Ps. lxxiii. 20, Isa. xxix. 7 sq.). Eyes looked upon him (שָׁרָה only in the book of Job in this signification of a fixed scorching look, cogn. שָׂרַף, adurere, as is manifest from Cant. i. 6), and do it no more; and his place (מְקוֹמוֹ construed as fem., as Gen. xviii. 24, 2 Sam. xvii. 12, Cheth.) shall not henceforth regard him (שָׁרָה, especially frequent in the book of Job, prop. to go about, cogn. תָּוַר, then to look about one). The futt. here everywhere describe what shall meet the evil-doer. Therefore Ewald's transl., "his fists smote down the weak," cannot be received. Moreover, הִפְנִי, which must then and is filled from beneath by means of an opening which serves as a door. The outside of the qubbe is plastered over with a thick solution of dung; and this coating, when once dried in the sun, entirely protects the building, which is both storehouse and store, against the winter rains. When they begin to use the fuel, they take from the inside first by means of the doorway, and afterwards (by which time the heavy rains are over) they use up the building itself, removing the upper part first by means of a ladder. By the summer the qubbe has disappeared. Many large households have three or four of these stores. Where walled-in courts are spacious, as is generally the case, they stand within; where not, outside. The communities bordering on the desert, and exposed to attacks from the Arabs, place them close round their villages, which gives them a peculiar appearance. When attacked, the herds are driven behind these buildings, and the peasants make their appearance between them with their javelins. Seetzen reckons the gelle among the seven characteristics of the district of Haurân (Basan).

It appears that Ezek. iv. 12 sqq.—where the prophet is allowed the usual cow-dung, the flame of which has no smell whatever, and its ashes, which smoulder for a long time, are as clean as wood ashes, instead of the cakes (בִּלְלִי) of human dung—is to be explained according to this custom. My fellow-travellers have frequently roasted mushrooms (futtr) and truffles (faq', פֶּקַע) in the early spring in the glowing ashes of the gelle. On the other hand, it would be an error to infer from this passage that be read instead of בְּנָיו, does not occur elsewhere in this athletic signification; and it is quite unnecessary to derive יִרְצוּ from a רָצָה = רָצוּ (to crush, to hurl to the ground), or to change it to יִרְצוּ (Schnurrer) or יִרְצֻּ (Olsh.); for although the thought, filios ejus vexabunt egeni (LXX. according to the reading θλάσειαν, and Targ. according to the reading יִרְעֲעֹן), is not unsuitable for ver. 10b, a sense more natural in connection with the position of בְּנָיו, and still more pleasing, is gained if רָצָה is taken in the usual signification: to conciliate, appease, as the Targ. according to the reading יִרְעֵן (Peschito-word for ἀποκαταλλάσσειν), and Ges., Vaih., Schlottm., and others, after Aben-Ezra, Ralbag, Merc.: filii ejus placabunt tenues, quos scilicet eorum pater diripuerat, vel eo inopiæ adigentur, ut pauperibus sese adjungere et ab illis inire gratiam cogantur. Its retributive relation to ver. 19a is also retained by this rendering. The children of the unfeeling oppressor of the poor the Semites made use of human dung for fuel; the Semites (including the Nomads) are the most scrupulously particular people respecting cleanliness. According to the above, Zeph. i. 17 may be explained: "their flesh shall become like dung," i.e. be burned or destroyed like dung. And also we understand the above passage in the book of Job, "as his heap of dung-cakes shall he be consumed away," exactly like 1 Kings xiv. 10: "I will burn (take away) the remnant of the house of Jeroboam, as a man burneth the dung-cakes until they are consumed." The suff. in בְּגִלְלֵי refers to the habitation of the evil-doer, above whose grovelling joy the high dome of the dung-cakes rises, which, before one becomes aware of it, has disappeared; and throughout the description of the sudden destruction of the evil-doer, vers. 8, 9, the reader must keep the figure of this dome and its disappearing before his mind. If it be objected that by such a rendering בְּגִלְלֵי would be expected, 1 Kings xiv. 10 shows that גִּלְלָה (גִּלָּה) was also used as a collective, and the Arabic gelle is never used in any other way, which is the more remarkable, as one from the first regards its termination as the "ğ of unity." My attendants on my journey from Damascus (where there is no gelle, and consequently the word is not used) always took it so, and formed the plural gellât and the collective gilel, and were always laughed at and corrected: say اقراص جلة^{١٤} or طباييع جله^{١٥}—WETZST.

will be obliged, when the tyrant is dead, to conciliate the destitute; and his hands, by means of his children, will be obliged to give back his property, i.e. to those whom his covetousness had brought to beggary (חֵן, exertion, strength, ch. xviii. 7, then as חֵן, and synonym. חֵן, wealth, prob. from the radical meaning to breathe, which is differently applied in the Arabic aun, rest, and haun, lightness). Carey thinks that the description is retrospective: even he himself in his lifetime, which, however, does not commend itself, since here it is throughout the deceased who is spoken of. As in ver. 9, so now in ver. 11 also, perf. and fut. interchange, the former of the past, the latter of the future. Jerome, by an amalgamation of two distinct radical significations, translates: ossa ejus implebuntur (it should be impleta erant) vitiis adolescentiæ ejus, which is to be rejected, because עָלִים, Ps. xc. 8, is indeed intended of secret sin, but signifies generally that which is secret (veiled). On the contrary, עֲלֻמִּים, ch. xxxiii. 25, certainly signifies adolescentia (Arab. غُلُومَة), and is accordingly, after LXX., Targ., and Syr., to be translated: his bones were full of youthful vigour. In ver. 11*b*, הִשְׁכָּח, as ch. xiv. 19, might refer to the purely plural עֲצֻמוֹתָיו, but the predicate belonging to it would then be plur. in ver. 11*a*, and sing. in ver. 11*b*; on which account the reference to עָלִים, which is in itself far more suitable, is to be preferred (Hirz., Schlottm.): his youthful vigour, on which he relied, lies with him in the dust (of the grave).

- 12 *If wickedness tasted sweet in his mouth,
He hid it under his tongue;*
- 13 *He carefully cherished it and did not let it go,
And retained it in his palate:*
- 14 *Yet his bread is now changed in his bowels,
It is the gall of vipers within him.*

15 He hath swallowed down riches and now he spitteth them out,

God shall drive them out of his belly.

16 *He sucked in the poison of vipers,
The tongue of the adder slayeth him.*

The evil-doer is, in vers. 12 sq., likened to an epicure; he keeps hold of wickedness as long as possible, like a delicate morsel that is retained in the mouth (Renan: comme un bonbon qu'on laisse fondre dans la bouche), and seeks to enjoy it to the very last. הִמְתִּיק, to make sweet, has here the intransitive signification dulcescere, Ew. § 122, c. הִבְחִיר, to remove from sight, signifies elsewhere to destroy, here to conceal (as the Piel, ch. vi. 10, xv. 18). חָמַל, to spare, is construed with עַל, which is usual with verbs of covering and protecting. The conclusion of the hypothetical antecedent clauses begins with ver. 14; the perf. נִהַפָּה (with Kametz by Athnach) describes the suddenness of the change; the מְרוֹרֶת which follows is not equivalent to לְמְרוֹרֶת (Luther: His food shall be turned to adder's gall in his body), but ver. 14b expresses the result of the change in a substantival clause. The bitter and poisonous are synonymous in the ancient languages; hence we find the meanings poison and gall (ver. 25) in מְרוֹרֶה, and רֹאשׁ signifies both a poisonous plant which is known by its bitterness, and the poison of serpents like to the poison of plants (ver. 16; Deut. xxxii. 33). הָיָל (ver. 15) is property, without the accompanying notion of forcible acquisition (Hirz.), which, on the contrary, is indicated by the בָּלַע. The following fut. consec. is here not aor., but expressive of the inevitable result which the performance of an act assuredly brings: he must vomit back the property which he has swallowed down; God casts it out of his belly, i.e. (which is implied in הוֹרִישׁ, expellere) forcibly, and therefore as by the pains of colic. The LXX., according to whose taste the mention of God here was contrary to decorum, transl. ἐξ οἰκίας (read κοιλίας, according to Cod. Alex.) αὐτοῦ ἐξελκύσει αὐτὸν ἄγγελος (Theod. δυνάστης). The perf., ver. 15*a*, is in ver. 16*a* changed into the imperf. fut. πῖ", which more strongly represents the past action as that which has gone before what is now described ; and the ἀσυνδέτως fut., which follows, describes the consequence which is necessarily and directly involved in it. Ps. cxl. 4 may be compared with ver. 16*a*, Prov. xxiii. 32 with 16*b*. He who sucked in the poison of low desire with a relish, will meet his punishment in that in which he sinned : he is destroyed by the poisonous deadly bite of the serpent, for the punishment of sin is fundamentally nothing but the nature of sin itself brought fully out.

Like to rivers and brooks of honey and cream.

18 Giving back that for which he laboured, he shall not swallow it ;

He shall not rejoice according to the riches he hath gotten.

19 Because he cast down, let the destitute lie helpless ;

He shall not, in case he hath seized a house, finish building it.

20 Because he knew no rest in his craving,

He shall not be able to rescue himself with what he most loveth.

As poets sing of the aurea ætas of the paradise-like primeval age : Flumina jam lactis, jam flumina nectaris ibant,¹ and as the land of promise is called in the words of Jehovah in the Thora, "a land flowing with milk and honey," the puffed-up prosperity to which the evil-doer has attained by injustice is likened to streams (פְּלִגּוֹת, prop. dividings, and indeed either of a country = districts, Judg. v. 15 sq., or as here, of a fountain = streams) of rivers, of brooks (two gen. appositionis which are co-ordinate, of which Hupfeld thinks one must be crossed out; they, however, are not unpoetical, since, just as in Ps. lxxviii. 9, the flow of words is suspended, Ew. § 289, c) of honey and cream (comp. cream and oil, ch. xxix. 6), if נהרי נחלי is not perhaps (which is more in accordance with the accentuation) intended as an explanatory permutative of בפלגות: he shall not feast himself upon streams, streamings of rivers of honey and cream (Dachselt); and by אֶל־יֵרָא (seq. Beth, to fasten one's gaze upon anything = feast one's self upon it), the prospect of enjoying this prosperity, and indeed, since the moral judgment and feeling are concerned in the affirmation of the fact (אֵל, as ch. v. 22, Ps. xli. 3, Prov. iii. 3, 25), the privilege of this prospect, is denied him. This thought, that the enjoyment aimed at and anticipated shall not follow the attainment of this height of prosperity, is reiterated in a twofold form in ver. 18.

Ver. 18a is not to be translated: He gives back that which he has gained without swallowing it down, which must have been יָשִׁיב; the syntactic relation is a different one: the Waw of וְלֹא is not expressive of detail; the detailing is implied in the partic., which is made prominent as an antecedent, as if it were: because, or since, he gives out again that which he has acquired (יָנַע only here instead of יָנַע, ch. x. 3 and freq.), he has no pleasure in it, he shall or may not altogether swallow it down (Targ. incorrectly וְלֹא־יִנְמַר, after the Arabic بَلַغ, to penetrate, attain an object). The formation of the clause corresponds entirely with ver. 18b. All attempts at interpretation which connect פָּחַל תְּמִנָּתוֹ with מִשִּׁיב, ver. 18a, are to be objected to: (he gives it back again) as property of his restitution, i.e. property that is to be restored (Schlottm.), or the property of another (Hahn). Apart from the unsuitableness of the expression to the meaning found in it, it is contrary to the relative independence of the separate lines of the verse, which our poet almost always preserves, and is also opposed by the interposing of וְלֹא יִבְלַע. The explanation chosen by Schult., Oet., Umbr., Hirz., Renan, and others, after the Targ., is utterly impossible: as his possession, so his exchange (which is intended to mean: restitution, giving up); this, instead of בְּחִיל, must have been not merely בְּחִיל, but בְּחִילוֹ. The designed relation of the members of the sentence is without doubt, as 18*a*, this: בְּחִיל תְּמֹורָתוֹ is a nearer defining of וְלֹא יַעֲלֶם, after the manner of an antecedent clause, from which, that it may be emphatically prominent, it begins by means of Waw apod. (to which Schult. not unsuitably compares Jer. vi. 19, 1 Kings xv. 13). The following explanation is very suitable: according to the power, i.e. entire fulness of his exchange, but not in the sense of “to the full amount of its value” (Carey, as Rosenm.), connected with מִשִּׁיב, but connected with what follows: “how great soever his exchange (gain), still he does not rejoice” (Ew.). But it is not probable that חֵיל here signifies power = a great quantity, where property and possessions are spoken of. The most natural rendering appears to me to be this: according to the relation of the property of his exchange (תְּמֹורָה from מֹור, Syr. directly emere, cogn. מָהַר, מָחַר, and perhaps also מָכַר, here of exchange, barter, or even acquisition, as ch. xv. 31; comp. xxviii. 17, of the means of exchange), i.e. of the property exchanged, bartered, gained by barter by him, he is not to rejoice, i.e. the rejoicing which might have been expected in connection with the greatness of the wealth he has amassed, departs from him.

Jerome is not the only expositor who (as though the Hebrew tenses were subject to no rule, and might mean everything) translates ver. 19, domum rapuit et non ædificavit eam (equivalent to quam non ædificaverat). Even Hupfeld translates thus, by taking וְהָיָה לֹא בָנָהּ as imperfect = וְהָיָה לֹא בָנָהּ; but he, of course, fails to furnish a grammatical proof for the possibility of inferring a plusquamperfectum sense. It might sooner be explained: instead of building it (Lit. Centralblatt, 1853, Nr. 24). But according to the syntax, ver. 19a must be an antecedent clause: because he crushed, left (therefore: crushed by himself) the destitute alone;¹ and 19b the conclusion: he has pillaged a house, and will not build it, i.e. in case he has plundered a house, he will not build it up. For בֵּית נָזַל, according to the accents, which are here correct, is not to be translated: domus, quam rapuit, but hypothetically: si (ἐὰν) domum rapuit, to which וְהָיָה לֹא בָנָהּ is connected by Waw apod. (comp. ch. vii. 21b); and בָּנָהּ signifies here, as frequently, not: to build, but: to build round, build additions to, continue building (comp. 2 Chron. xi. 5, 6; Ps. lxxxix. 3, 5). In ver. 20 similar periodizing occurs: because he knew not שָׁלוֹם (neutral = שָׁלוֹם, Prov. xvii. 1; Ew. § 293, c), contentment, rest, and sufficiency (comp. Isa. lix. 8, לֹא יָדַע שָׁלוֹם) in his belly, i.e. his craving, which swallows up everything: he will not be able to deliver himself (מִלֵּט like פָּלַט, ch. xxiii. 7, as intensive of Kal: to escape, or also = מִלֵּט נִפְשׁוֹ, which Amos ii. 25 seems to favour) with (כִּי as ch. xix. 20) his dearest treasure (thus e.g. Ewald), or: he will not be able to rescue his dearest object, prop. not to effect a rescue with his dearest object, the obj., as ch. xvi. 4, 10, xxxi. 12, conceived of as the instrument (vid. e.g. Schlottm.). The former explanation is more natural and simple. חֲמוּר, ¹ The Targ. translates: because he brought to ruin the business of the poor (עֲבוֹן after עֲבוֹן in Ezekiel); and Parchon: because he brought to ruin the courts of the poor (after the Mishna-word מַעֲיִיבָה, a paved floor); but עֲבוֹן, according to the Masora on Isa. lviii. 2 (comp. Kimchi, Michlol, p. 35), is to be read עֲוֹן, as a verb.

that which is exceedingly desired (Ps. xxxix. 12, of health and pleasantness; Isa. xlv. 9, of idols, as the cherished objects of their worshippers), is the dearest and most precious thing to which the sinner clung with all his soul, not, as Böttch. thinks, the soul itself.¹

- 21 *Nothing escaped his covetousness,
Therefore his prosperity shall not continue.*
22 In the fulness of his need it shall be strait with him, Every hand of the needy shall come upon him.
23 *It shall come to pass : in order to fill his belly,
He sendeth forth the glow of His anger into him,
And He causeth it to rain upon him into his flesh.*
24 *If he is obliged to flee before an iron weapon,
Then a brazen bow pierceth him through.*
25 *It teareth, then it cometh forth out of his body,
And the steel out of his gall,
The terrors of death come upon him.*

The words of ver. 21a are : there was nothing that escaped

(שָׁרִיד, as ch. xviii. 19, from שָׁרַד, שָׁרַד, aufugere) his eating (from אָכַל, not from אָכַל), i.e. he devoured everything without sparing, even to the last remnant; therefore טוֹבוֹ, his prosperity, his abundant wealth, will not continue or hold out (יָחִיל, as Ps. x. 5, to be solid, powerful, enduring, whence

¹ Hupfeld interprets : non fruitur securus ventre suo h. e. cibo quo venter potitus erat et deliciis quas non salvas retinebit (or also ver. 20b as a clause by itself : cum deliciis suis non evadet), but without any proof that יָדַע בָּ can signify frui, and בָּטֵן metonymically food, whereas the assertion that נִשְׁלֹן cannot be equivalent to נִשְׁלֹן, and cannot be used of rest with reference to the desire, is unfounded. In Hebrew the neuter adj. can be used as a substantive, just as in Greek, e.g. τὸ ἀσφαλές, security, τὸ εὐτυχές, success (comp. e.g. the combination ואמת and ברחמים), and שָׁלוֹ signifies release and ease (Arab. followed by عَنِ), without distinction of what disturbs, be it danger, or pain, or any kind of emotion whatever.

(.حيلة, حَوْل, حِيل). Hupf. transl. differently : nihil ei superstes ad vescendum, itaque non durant ejus bona ; but שָׂרִיד signifies first elapsum, and עַל־כֵּן propterea ; and we may retain these first significations, especially since ver. 21a is not future like 21b. The tone of prediction taken up in ver. 21b is continued in what follows. The inf. constr. מְלֹאֹת (prop. מְלֹאֹת, but with Cholem by the Aleph, since the Waw is regarded as יְתִיר, superfluous), formed after the manner of the verbs Lamed He (Ew. 238, c), is written like מְלֹאֹת, Judg. viii. 1 (comp. on the other hand the scriptio defectiva, Lev. viii. 33, xii. 4) ; and שָׂפָק (with Sin, as Norzi decides after Codd., Kimchi, and Farisol, not Samech) is to be derived from שָׂפָק (סָפָק), sufficiencia (comp. the verb, 1 Kings xx. 10) : when his sufficiency exists in abundance, not from שָׂפָק = سَفَقَة, complosio, according to which Schultens explains : when his joyous clapping of hands has reached its highest point (Elizabeth Smith : “while clapping the hands in the fulness of joy”), to which מְלֹאֹת is not suitable, and which ought at least to be שָׂפָק בְּפִי. Therefore : in the fulness of his need shall he be straitened (יָצַר with the tone drawn back, for יָצַר on account of the following monosyllable, although also apocopated futt. follow further on in the strict future signification, according to poetic usage), by which not merely the fearful foreboding is meant, which just in the fullest overflow makes known his impending lot, but the real calamity, into which his towering prosperity suddenly changes, as ver. 22b shows : All the hands of the destitute come upon him (בּוֹא seq. acc. : invadere) to avenge on him the injustice done to the needy. It is not necessary to understand merely such as he has made destitute, it is בְּלִי־יָד ; the assertion is therefore general : the rich uncompassionate man becomes a defenceless prey of the proletaries.

Ver. 23. The יְהִי which opens this verse (and which also occurs elsewhere, e.g. ch. xviii. 12, in a purely future signification), here, like יְהִי, 2 Sam. v. 24 (Ew. § 333, b), serves to introduce the following יִשְׁלַח (it shall happen : He shall send forth); יְהִי (e.g. Gen. xl. 1) frequent in the historical style, and יְהִי in the prophetic, are similarly used. In order to fill his belly, which is insatiable, God will send forth against him His glowing wrath (comp. Lam. i. 13, from on high hath He sent fire into my bones), and will rain upon him into his flesh, or his plumpness (Arab. fi lachmihi). Thus we believe בְּלֶחֱמוֹ must be understood by referring to Zeph. i. 17; where, perhaps not without reference to this speech of Zophar, the בְּנִלְלִים, which serves to explain ver. 7, coincides with וּלְחֶמֶם, which serves to explain this בְּלֶחֱמוֹ; and the right meaning is not even missed by the LXX., which translates καὶ τὰς σάρκας αὐτῶν ὡς βόλβιτα.¹ A suitable thought is obtained if לֶחֶם is taken in the signification, food: He will rain upon him his food, i.e. what is fit for him (with Beth of the instrument instead of the accusative of the object), or: He will rain down (His wrath) upon him as his food (with Beth essent., according to which Ew.: what can satisfy him; Bridel: pour son aliment; Renan: en guise de pain); but we give the preference to the other interpretation, because it is at once natural in this book, abounding in Arabisms, to suppose for לֶחֶם the signification of the Arab. لَحْم, which is also supported in Hebrew by Zeph. i. 17; further, because the Targ. favours it, which transl. בְּשִׁלְרִיָּה, and expositors, as Aben-Ezra and Ralbag, who interpret by בְּבִשְׂרוֹ; finally, because it gives an appropriate idea, to which Lam. i. 13 presents a commendable parallel, comp. also James v. 3, and Koran,

Sur. 2, 169 : "those who hide what God has sent down by the Scripture, and thereby obtain a small profit, eat only fire into their belly." That עֲלִימוֹ can be used pathetically for עֲלִי is unmistakeably clear from ch. xxii. 2, comp. xxvii. 23, and on Ps. xi. 7; the morally indignant speech which threatens punishment, intentionally seeks after rare solemn words and darksome tones. Therefore: Upon his flesh, which has been nourished in unsympathizing greediness, God rains down, i.e. rain of fire, which scorches it. This is the hidden background of the lot of punishment, the active principle of which, though it be effected by human agency, is the punitive power of the fire of divine wrath. Vers. 24 sq. describe, by illustration, how it is worked out. The evil-doer fleeing before a hostile superior power, is hit in the back by the enemy's arrows; and when, having fallen, he seeks to get free from them, he is made to feel the terrors of inevitably approaching death.

Ver. 24. The two futt. may be arranged as in a conditional clause, like Ps. xci. 7a, comp. Amos ix. 2-4; and this is, as it seems, the mutual relation of the two expressions designed by the poet (similar to Isa. xxiv. 18): if he flee from the weapons of iron, i.e. the deadly weapon in the thick of the fight, he succumbs to that which is destructive by and by: the bow of brass (נְחֹשֶׁת poet. for נְחָשֶׁת, as Ps. xviii. 35, although it might also be an adj., since eth, as the Arab. قوس shows, is really a feminine termination) will pierce him through (fut. Kal of חָלַף, خلف, to press further and further, press after, here as in Judg. v. 26). The flight of the disheartened is a punishment which is completed by his being hit while fleeing by the arrow which the brazen bow with its powerful spring sends after him. In ver. 25 the Targ. reads מִנִּיּוֹה with He mappic., and translates: he (the enemy, or God) draws (stringit), and it (the sword) comes out of its sheath, which is to be rejected because נִי cannot signify vagina. Kimchi and most Jewish expositors interpret מִנִּיחָה by מִנִּיחָה; the LXX. also translates it σῶμα. To understand it according to נִי (back), of the hinder part of the body, gives no suitable sense, since the evil-doer is imagined as hit in the back, the arrow consequently as passing out at the front;¹ whereas the signification body is suitable, and is also made sufficiently certain by the cognate form נִיחָה. The verb שָׁלַח, however, is used as in Judg. iii. 22: he who is hit draws the arrow out, then it comes out of his body, into which it is driven deep; and the glance, i.e. the metal head of the arrow (like לֶחֶב, Judg. iii. 22, the point in distinction from the shaft), out of his gall (מִרְחָה = מִרְחָה, ch. xvi. 13, so called from its bitterness, as χολή, χόλος, comp. χλόος, χλωρός, from the green-yellow colour), since, as the Syriac version freely translates, his gall-bladder is burst.² Is יְהִלָּה, as a parallel word to וַיֵּצֵא, to be connected with מִמֶּרְחוֹ, or with what follows? The accentuation varies. The ordinary interpunction is וּבֶרֶק with Dechî, מִמֶּרְחוֹ Mercha, or more correctly Mercha-Zinnorith, יְהִלָּה Rebia mugrasch (according to which, Ew., Umbr., Vaih., Welte, Hahn, Schlottm., and Olsh. divide), מִמֶּרְחוֹ is, however, also found with Athnach. Although the latter mode of accentuation is only feebly supported, we nevertheless consider it as the more correct, for עָלְיוֹ אֲמִים, in the mind of the poet, can hardly have formed

“My grief for her is the grief of him whose horse is dashed in pieces in the desert.

The way is wild, and there is no help from the travellers who have hurried on before.

My groaning is like the groaning of one who, mortally wounded between the shoulders,

Will flee, and trails after him the lance that is fastened in him.”

—WETZST.

² Abulwalid (in Kimchi) understands the red gall, i.e. the gall-bladder, by מִרְחָה, after the Arabic marâre. If this is pierced, its contents are emptied into the lower part of the body, and the man dies.

a line of the verse. If, however, יהלך עליו אמים is now taken together, it is a matter for inquiry whether it is to be explained: he passes away, since terrors come upon him (Schult., Rosenm., Hirz., Von Gerl., Carey), or: terrors come upon him (LXX., Targ., Syr., Jer., Ramban). We consider the latter as the only correct interpretation; for if יהלך ought to be understood after ch. xiv. 20, xvi. 22, the poet would have expressed himself ambiguously, since it is at least as natural to consider אמים as the subject of יהלך, as to take עליו אמים as an adverbial clause. The former, however, is both natural according to the syntax (vid. Ges. § 147, a) and suitable in matter: terrors (i.e. of certain death to him in a short time) draw on upon him, and accordingly we decide in its favour.

- 26 *All darkness is reserved for his treasured things,
A fire that is not blown upon devoureth him;
It feedeth upon what is left in his tent.*
- 27 *The heavens reveal his iniquity,
And the earth riseth up against him.*
- 28 The produce of his house must vanish, Flowing away in the day of God's wrath.
- 29 *This is the lot of the wicked man from Elohim,
And the heritage decreed for him from God.*

As in Ps. xvii. 14 God's store of earthly goods for the children of men is called צָפֶן (צִפְּיֹן), so here the stores laid up by man himself are called צִפְּיֹנָיו. Total darkness, which will finally destroy them, is decreed by God against these stores of the godless, which are brought together not as coming from the hand of God, but covetously, and regardless of Him. Instead of טָמֶן it might also have been צָפֶן (ch. xv. 20, xxi. 19, xxiv. 1), and instead of לְצִפְּיֹנָיו also לְטָמֶנָיו (Deut. xxxiii. 19); but טָמֶן is, as ch. xl. 13 shows, better suited to darkness (on account of the ט, this dull-toned muta, with which the word begins). כָּל־הַשֶּׁךְ signifies sheer darkness, as in Ps. xxxix. 6, כָּל־הַבֹּל, sheer nothingness; Ps. xlv. 14, כָּל־כְּבוֹדָה, sheer splendour; and perhaps Isa. iv. 5, כָּל־כְּבוֹד, sheer glory. And the thought, expressed with somewhat of a play upon words, is, that to the θησαυρίζειν of the godless corresponds a θησαυρίζειν of God, the Judge (Rom. ii. 5; James v. 3): the one gathers up treasures, and the other nothing but darkness, to which at an appointed season they shall be surrendered. The תִּאֲכָלֶהוּ which follows is regarded by Ges. as Piel instead of תִּאֲכָלֶהוּ, but such a resolving of the characteristic sharpened syllable of Piel is unsupportable; by Hirz., Olsh. § 250, b, as Pual instead of תִּאֲכָלֶהוּ, but אָכַל signifies to be eaten, not (so that it might be connected with an accusative of the obj.) to get to eat; by Ew., Hupf., as Kal for תִּאֲכָלֶהוּ, which is possible both from the letters and the matter (vid. on Ps. xciv. 20); but more correctly it is regarded as Poel, for such Poel forms from strong roots do occur, as שָׁפַט (vid. on ch. ix. 15), and that the Cholem of these forms can be shortened into Kametz-chatuph is seen from וְדָרְשִׁי, Ps. cix. 10 (vid. Psalter in loc.).¹ The Poel is in the passage before us the intensive of Kal: a fire which is not blown upon shall eat him up. By this translation נִפְחָה is equivalent to נִפְחָהּ, since attention is given to the gender of אֵשׁ in the verb immediately connected with it, but it is left out of consideration in the verbs נִפַּח and יִרַע which stand further from it, which Olshausen thinks doubtful; there are, however, not a few examples which may be adduced in favour of it, as 1 Kings xix. 11, Isa. xxxiii. 9; comp. Ges. § 147, rem. 1. Certainly the relative clause לֹא נִפַּח may also be explained by supplying בָּהּ: into which one has not blown, or that one has not blown on (Symm., Theod., ἀνευ φυσήματος): both renderings are possible, according to Ezek. xxii. 20, 22; but since the masc. יָרַע follows, having undoubtedly אֵשׁ as its subject, we can unhesitatingly take the Synallage gen. as beginning even with נִפַּח. A fire which needs no human help for its kindling and its maintenance is intended (compare on לֹא בִיָּד, ch. xxxiv. 20); therefore “fire of God,” ch. i. 16. This fire feasts upon what has escaped (שָׂרִיד, as ver. 21, ch. xviii. 19), i.e. whatever has escaped other fates, in his tent. יָרַע (Milel) is fut. apoc. Kal; the form of writing יָרַע (fut. apoc. Niph.) proposed by Olsh. on account of the change of gender, i.e. it is devoured, is to be rejected for the reason assigned in connection with נִפַּח. The correct interpretation has been brought forward by Schultens.

It is not without reference to ch. xvi. 18, 19, where Job has called upon earth and heaven as witnesses, that in ver. 27 Zophar continues: “the heavens reveal his guilt, and the earth rises against him;” heaven and earth bear witness to his being an abhorrence, not worthy of being borne by the earth and shone upon by the light of heaven; they testify this, since their powers from below and above vie with one another to get rid of him. מִתְקוֹמָמָה is connected closely with לֵי (which has Lamed raphatum) by means of Mercha-Zinnorith, and is the pausal form of the fem. part. מִתְקוֹמָמָה; comp. on this influence of the pause on the penultima, Deut. xxxii. 37.¹ In ver. 28, Ges., Olsh., and others translate: the produce of his house, that which is swept together, must vanish away in the day of His wrath ; נִירוֹת corrasæ (opes), Niph. from נָרַר. But first, the suff. is wanting to נָרוֹת ; and secondly, בְּיוֹם אָפוֹ has no natural connection in what precedes. The Niph. נָרוֹת in the signification diffluentia, derived from נָרַר, to flow away (comp. جرى, to flow), is incomparably better suited to the passage (comp. 2 Sam. xiv. 14, where Luther transl. : as water which glides away into the earth). The close of the description is similar to Isa. xvii. 11 : “In the day that thou plantedst, thou causedst it to increase, and with the morning thy seed was in flower—a harvest-heap in the day of deep wounding and deadly sorrow.” So here everything that the evil-doer hoards up is spoken of as “vanishing in the day of God’s wrath.”

The speech now closes by summing up like Bildad’s, ch. xviii. 21 : “This is the portion or inheritance of, i.e. the lot that is assigned or falls to, the wicked man (אָדָם רָשָׁע, a rare application of אָדָם, comp. Prov. vi. 12, instead of which אִישׁ is more usual) from Elohim, and this the heritage of his (i.e. concerning him) decree from God.” אָמַר (אִמַר) with an objective suff., which also occurs elsewhere of the almighty word or command of God (vid. on Hab. iii. 9), signifies here God’s judicial arrangement or order, in this sense just as Arabic as Hebraic, for also in Arab. amr (plur. awâmir) signifies command and order.

The speech of Zophar, ch. xx., is his ultimatum, for in the third course of the controversy he takes no part. We have already seen from his first speech, ch. xi., that he is the most impassioned of the friends. His vehemence is now the less excusable, since Job in his previous speech has used the truly while מִתְקַוֶּמָּה, as Milel, is the pausal-form of the fem. part. Hithpalel for מִתְקַוֶּמָּה (מִתְקַוֶּמָּה) with pausal â instead of ê, it ought to be as Milra, a passive form ; but the Hithpalal has no meaning here, and is in general not firmly supported within the range of biblical Hebrew.

spiritual language of importunate entreaty and earnest warning in reply to the friends. The friends would now have done well if they had been silent, and still better if they had recognised in the sufferer the tried and buffeted servant of God, and had withdrawn their charges, which his innermost nature repudiates. But Zophar is not disposed to allow the reproach of the correction which they received to rest upon him; in him we have an illustration of the fact that a man is never more eloquent than when he has to defend his injured honour, but that he is also never more in danger of regarding the extravagant images of natural excitement as a higher inspiration, or, however, as striking justifications coming from the fulness of a superior perception. It has been rightly remarked, that in Zophar the poet describes to us one of those hot-heads who pretend to fight for religion that is imperilled, while they are zealous for their own wounded vanity. Instead of being warned by Job's threat of judgment, he seeks to thrust back his attempt at producing dismay by a similar attempt. He has nothing new to bring forward in reply to Job; the poet has skilfully understood how to turn the heart of his readers step by step from the friends, and in the same degree to gain its sympathy for Job. For they are completely spent in their one dogma; and while in Job an endless multitude of thoughts and feelings surge up one after another, their heart is as hermetically closed against every new perception and emotion. All that is new in the speech of Zophar, and in those of the friends generally, in this second course of the controversy, is, that they no longer try to lure Job on to penitence by promises, but endeavour to bring him to a right state of mind, or rather to weaken his supposedly-mad assault upon themselves, by presenting to him only the most terrible images. It is not possible to illustrate the principle that the covetous, uncompassionate rich man is torn away from his prosperity by the punishment God decrees for him, more fearfully and more graphically than Zophar does it; and this terrible description is not overdrawn, but true and appropriate,—but in opposition to Job it is the extreme of uncharitableness which outdoes itself: applied to him, the fearful truth becomes a fearful lie. For in Zophar's mind Job is the godless man, whose rejoicing does not last long, who indeed raises himself towards heaven, but as his own dung must he perish, and to whom the sin of his unjust gain is become as the poison of the viper in his belly. The arrow of God's wrath sticks fast in him; and though he draw it out, it has already inflicted on him a deservedly mortal wound! The fire of God which has already begun to consume his possessions, does not rest until even the last remnant in his tent is consumed. The heavens, where in his self-delusion he seeks the defender of his innocence, reveal his guilt, and the earth, which he hopes to have as a witness in his favour, rises up as his accuser. Thus mercilessly does Zophar seek to stifle the new trust which Job conceives towards God, and to extinguish the faith which bursts upwards from beneath the ashes of the conflict. Zophar's method of treatment is soul-destroying; he seeks to slay that life which germinates from the feeling of death, instead of strengthening it. He does not, however, succeed; for so long as Job does not become doubtful of his innocence, the uncharitableness of the friends must be to him the thread by which he finds his way through the labyrinth of his sufferings to the God who loves him, although He seems to be angry with him.

Job's Third Answer.—Chap. xxi.

Schema: 10. 10. 10. 11. 10. 10. 5. 2.

[Then began Job, and said:]

2 Hear, oh hear, my speech,

And let this be instead of your consolations.

- 3 *Suffer me, and I will speak,
And after I have spoken thou mayest mock.*
- 4 *As for me, then, doth my complaint concern man,
Or wherefore should I not become impatient?*
- 5 *Turn ye to me and be astonished,
And lay your hand upon your mouth.*
- 6 *Even if I think of it I am bewildered,
And my flesh taketh hold on horror—:*

The friends, far from being able to solve the enigma of Job's affliction, do not once recognise the mystery as such. They cut the knot by wounding Job most deeply by ever more and more frivolous accusations. Therefore he entreats them to be at least willing to listen (שָׁמְעוּ with the gerund) to his utterance (מִלָּה) respecting the unsolved enigma; then (Waw apodosis imper.) shall this attention supply the place of their consolations, i.e. be comforting to him, which their previous supposed consolations could not be. They are to bear with him, i.e. without interruption allow him to answer for himself (שִׁאֲנִי with Kametz before the tone, as Jonah i. 12, comp. קָחֶהוּ, 1 Kings xx. 33, not as Hirz. thinks under the influence of the distinctive accent, but according to the established rule, Ges. § 60, rem. 1); then he will speak (אֲנַכִּי contrast to the "ye" in שִׁאֲנִי without further force), and after he has expressed himself they may mock. It is, however, not תִּלְעִיגִי (as Olshausen corrects), but תִּלְעִיגִי (in a voluntative signific. = תִּלְעִיגִי), since Job here addresses himself specially to Zophar, the whole of whose last speech must have left the impression on him of a bitter sarcasm (σαρκασμός from σαρκάζειν in the sense of ch. xix. 22b), and has dealt him the freshest deep blow. In ver. 4 שִׁיחִי is not to be understood otherwise than as in ch. vii. 13, ix. 27, x. 1, xxiii. 2, and is to be translated "my complaint." Then the prominently placed אֲנַכִּי is to be taken, after Ezek. xxxiii. 17, Ges. § 121, 3, as an emphatic strengthening of the "my": he places his complaint in contrast with another. This emphasizing is not easily understood, if one, with Hupf., explains: nonne hominis est querela mea, so that ך is equivalent to הלא (which here in the double question is doubly doubtful), and ל is the sign of the cause. Schultens and Berg, who translate לאדם more humano, explain similarly, by again bringing their suspicious ל *comparativum*¹ here to bear upon it. The ל by שיהי (if it may not also be compared with ch. xii. 8) may certainly be expected to denote those to whom the complaint is addressed. We translate: As for me, then, does my complaint concern men? The אני which is placed at the beginning of the sentence comes no less under the rule, Ges. § 145, 2, than § 121, 3. In general, sufferers seek to obtain alleviation of their sufferings by imploring by words and groans the pity of sympathizing men; the complaint, however, which the three hear from him is of a different kind, for he has long since given up the hope of human sympathy,—his complaint concerns not men, but God (comp. ch. xvi. 20).² He reminds them of this by asking further: or (ואם), as ch. viii. 3, xxxiv. 17, xl. 9, not: and if it were so, as it is explained by Nolde contrary to the usage of the language) why (interrogative upon interrogative: an quare, as Ps. xciv. 9, אם הלא, an nonne) should not my spirit (disposition of mind, θυμός) be short, i.e. why should I not be short-tempered (comp. Judg x. 16, Zech. xi. 8, with Prov. xiv. 29) = impatient? Dürr, in his commentatio super voce ריח, 1776, 4, explains the expression habito simul halitus, qui iratis brevis esse solet, respectu, but the signification breath is far from the nature of the language here; רוּחַ signifies emotional excitement (comp. ch. xv. 13), either long restrained (with אָרָךְ), or not allowing itself to be restrained and breaking out after a short time (קָצֵר). That which causes his vexation to burst forth is such that the three also, if they would attentively turn to him who thus openly expresses it, will be astonished at it and lay their hand on their mouth (comp. ch. xxix. 9, xl. 4), i.e. they must become dumb in recognition of the puzzle,—a puzzle insoluble to them, but which is nevertheless not to be denied. הַשְׁמוּ is found in Codd. and among grammarians both as Hiph. הַשְׁמוּ hashammu (Kimchi) and as Hoph. הִשְׁמוּ, or what is the same, הֹשְׁמוּ hōsh-shammu (Abulwalid) with the sharpening of the first radical, which also occurs elsewhere in the Hoph. of this verb (Lev. xxvi. 34 sq.) and of others (Olsh. § 259, b, 260). The pointing as Hiph. (הַשְׁמוּ for הִשְׁמוּ) in the signification obstupescite is the better attested. Job himself has only to think of this mystery, and he is perplexed, and his flesh lays hold on terror. The expression is like ch. xviii. 20. The emotion is conceived of as a want arising from the subject of it, which that which produces it must as of necessity satisfy.

In the following strophe the representation of that which thus excites terror begins. The divine government does not harmonize with, but contradicts, the law maintained by the friends.

- 7 *Wherefore do the wicked live,
Become old, yea, become mighty in power?*
- 8 *Their posterity is established before them about them,
And their offspring before their eyes.*
- 9 *Their houses have peace without fear,
And the rod of Eloah cometh not upon them.*
- 10 His (the evil-doer's) bull gendereth and faileth not;

His cow calveth easily, and casteth not her calf.

- 11 *They let their little ones run about as a flock,
And their children jump about.*

The question in ver. 7 is the same as that which Jeremiah also puts forth, ch. xii. 1-3. It is the antithesis of Zophar's thesis, ch. xx. 5, and seeks the reason of the fact established by experience which had also well-nigh proved the ruin of an Asaph (Ps. lxxiii. comp. Mal. iii. 13-15), viz. that the ungodly, far from being overtaken by the punishment of their godlessness, continue in the enjoyment of life, that they attain to old age, and also a proportionately increasing power and wealth. The verb עָתָק, which in ch. xiv. 18, xviii. 4 (comp. the Hiph. ch. ix. 5, xxxii. 15), we read in the signification promoveri, has here, like the Arabic 'ataqa, 'atuqa, the signification to become old, ætate provehi; and גִּבַּר חֵיל, to become strong in property, is a synonym of הִשְׁפִּיחַ חֵיל, to acquire constantly increasing possessions, used in a similar connection in Ps. lxxiii. 12. The first feature in the picture of the prosperity of the wicked, which the pang of being bereft of his own children brings home to Job, is that they are spared the same kind of loss: their posterity is established (נִבְּיוֹן, constitutus, elsewhere standing in readiness, ch. xii. 5, xv. 23, xviii. 12, here standing firm, as e.g. Ps. xciii. 2) in their sight about them (so that they have to mourn neither their loss by death nor by separation from their home), and their offspring (צִמְצִמַּיִם, a word common only to the undisputed as well as to the disputed prophecies of Isaiah and the book of Job) before their eyes; נֶכֶד must be carried over to ver. 8b as predicate: they are, without any loss, before their eyes. The description passes over from the children, the corner-stones of the house (vid. Ges. Thes., s.v. בָּנָה), to the houses themselves. It is just as questionable here as in ch. v. 24, Isa. xli. 3, and elsewhere, whether שְׁלוֹם is a subst. (= בְּשָׁלוֹם) or an adj.; the substantival rendering is at least equally admissible in such an elevated poetic speech, and the plur. subject בְּתֵיחֶם, which, if the predicate were intended to be taken as an adj., leads one to expect שְׁלוֹמִים, decides in its favour. On מִפְּחַד, without (far from) terrifying misfortune, as Isa. xxii. 3, מִקֶּשֶׁת, without a bow, vid. on ch. xix. 26. That which is expressed in ver. 9a, according to external appearance, is in ver. 9b referred to the final cause; Eloah's שֶׁבֶט, rod, with which He smites in punishment (ch. ix. 34, xxxvii. 13, comp. Isa. x. 24-26, where שֹׁט, scourge, interchanges with it), is not over them, i.e. threatens and smites them not.

Ver. 10 comes specially to the state of the cattle, after the state of the household in general has been treated of. Since שֹׁר and פָּרָה are interchangeable, and are construed according to their genus, the former undoubtedly is intended of the male, not also ἐγκολῶς of the female (LXX. ἡ βοῦς, Jerome, Saadia), as Rosenm., after Bochart, believes it must be taken, because עֵבֶר is never said de mare feminam ineunte, but always de femina quæ concipit. In reality, however, it is with עֵבֶר otherwise than with עֵרָה, whose Pael and Aphel certainly signify concupere (prop. transmittere sc. semen in a passive sense). On the other hand, עֵבֶר, even in Kal, signifies to be impregnated (whence עוֹבֵר, the embryo, and the biblical עֵבִיר, like the extra-biblical עֵבוֹר, the produce of the land), the Pael consequently to impregnate, whence מְעַבֵּרָא (from the part. pass. מְעַבֵּר) impregnated (pregnant), the Ithpa. to be impregnated, as Rabb. Pual מְעַבֵּרָתָא impregnated (by which עֵבֵרָתָא also signifies pregnant, which would be hardly possible if עֵבֶר in this sexual sense were not radically distinct from עֵבֶר, περ-âv). Accordingly the Targ. translates עֵבֵר by מְבִטֵּן (imprægnans), and Gecatilia translates שֹׁר by فَالِهِم (admissarius eorum), after which nearly all Jewish expositors explain. This explanation also suits לֹא יִנְעַל, which LXX. translates οὐκ ὠμοτόκησε (Jer. non abortivit), Symm. in a like sense οὐκ ἐξέτρωσε, Aq. οὐκ ἐξέβαλε, Saad. la julziq. The reference of שורו to the female animal everywhere assumed is incorrect; on the contrary, the bullock kept for breeding is the subject; but proceeding from this, that which is affirmed is certainly referred to the female animal. For נָעַל signifies to cast out, cast away; the Hiph. therefore: to cause to cast out; Rabb. in the specified signification: so to heat what has sucked in that which is unclean, that it gives it back or lets it go (לפלוט הבלוט). Accordingly Raschi explains: "he injects not useless seed into her, which might come back and be again separated (נפלט) from her inward part, without impregnation taking place." What therefore עֶבֶר says positively, ולא ינעיל says negatively: neque efficit ut ejiciat.¹ It is then further, in ver. 9b, said of the female animal which has been impregnated that she does not allow it to glide away, i.e. the fruit, therefore that she brings forth (הַמְלִיט, מַלֵּט as פֹּלֵט), and that she does not cause or suffer any untimely birth.

At the end of the strophe, ver. 11, the poet with delicate tact makes the sufferer, who is become childless, return to the joy of the wicked in the abundance of children. שָׁלַח signifies here, as Isa. xxxii. 20, to allow freedom for motion and exercise. On עָיִל, vid. on ch. xvi. 11, xix. 18. It has a similar root (עָל, alere) to the Arab. 'ajjil (collect. 'ijāl), servants, but not a similar meaning. The subj. to ver. 12 are not the children, but the "wicked" themselves, the happy fathers of the flocks of children that are let loose.

And rejoice at the sound of the pipe.*

- 13 *They enjoy their days in prosperity,
And in a moment they go down to Sheól.*
- 14 *And yet they said to God: "Depart from us!
We desire not the knowledge of Thy ways.*
- 15 *What is the Almighty, that we should serve Him?
And what doth it profit us that we should importune Him?"—*
- 16 *Lo! they have not their prosperity by their own hand,
The thought of the wicked be far from me!*

קוֹלֵם is to be supplied to יִשְׁאֲזוּ, as in Isa. xlii. 11; and instead of בְּתֶרֶף with בְּ of the musical accompaniment (as Ps. iv. 1, xlix. 5), it is to be read בְּתֶרֶף after the Masora with Kimchi, Ramban, Ralbag, and Farisol,¹ but not with Rosenm. to be explained: personant velut tympano et cythera, but: they raise their voice as the timbrel and harp sound forth simultaneously, בְּ as Isa. xviii. 4 (which is to be transl.: during the clear warmth of the sunshine, during the dew-clouds in the heat of harvest). הָף (Arabic duff, Spanish adufe) is τύμπανον (τύπανον), כְּנֹר (Arab. canâre) κυνύρα or κιθάρα (Dan. iii. 5), עֵינָב or עֵנָב, ch. xxx. 31 (from עָנַב, flare; vid. on Gen. iv. 21), the Pan-pipe (Targ. from a similar root אֶבְנִיבָא, whence the name of the ambubajæ). In ver. 13a the Keri gives the more usual יְבִלֵי (ch. xxxvi. 11) in place of the Chethib יְבִלֵי, though יְבִלֵי occurs in Isa. lxv. 22 without this Keri; יְבִלֵי signifies consumment, and יְבִלֵי usu deterent: they use up their life, enjoy it to the last drop. In connection with this one thinks of a coat which is not laid aside until it is entirely worn out. It is therefore not, as the friends say, that the ungodly is swept away before his time (ch. xv. 32), also a lingering sickness does not hand him over to death (xviii. 13 sq.), but בָּרַנֵּעַ, in a moment (comp. ch. xxxiv. 20, not : in rest, i.e. freedom from pain, which רָנֵּעַ never signifies), they sink down to Hades (acc. loci). The matter does not admit of one's deriving the fut. יִהְיֶה here, as ch. xxxix. 22, xxxi. 34, from the Niph. of the verb הָחֵת, terrore percelli; it is to be referred to נָחַת or נָחַת (Aram. for נָחַת), which is the only certain example of a Hebrew verb Pe Nun ending with ת, whose fut. is יִנָּחַת, Ps. xxxviii. 3, also יִנָּחַת (Prov. xvii. 10; Jer. xxi. 13), instead of יָחַת, and in the inflexion its ת (after the analogy of יִצְחָק, Isa. xxxiii. 12) is doubled; as an exception (vid. Psalter, ii. 468), the lengthening of the short vowel (יִנָּחַת, Olsh. § 83, b) by Silluk does not take place, as e.g. by Athnach, ch. xxxiv. 5.

The fut. consec. וַיִּאָּמְרוּ, in which ver. 14 is continued, does not here denote temporally that which follows upon and from something else, but generally that which is inwardly connected with something else, and even with that which is contradictory, and still occurring at the same time, exactly as Gen. xix. 9, 2 Sam. iii. 8, comp. Ew. § 231, b: they sink down after a life that is completely consumed away, without a death-struggle, into Hades, and yet they denied God, would not concern themselves about His ways (comp. the similar passage, Isa. lviii. 2), and accounted the worship of God and prayer (פָּנִיעַ בָּ, precibus adire) as useless. The words of the ungodly extend to ver. 15*b*; according to Hirz., Hlgst., Welte, and Hahn, ver. 16*a* resumes the description: behold, is not their prosperity in their hand? i.e. is it not at their free disposal? or: do they not everywhere carry it away with them? But ver. 16*b* is not favourable to this doubtful interrogative rendering of לֹא (= הֵלֵא). Schlottm. explains more correctly: behold, their prosperity is not in their power; but by taking not only ver. 16*a* (like Schnurrer), but the whole of ver. 16, as an utterance of an opponent, which is indeed impossible, because the declining of all fellowship with the godless would be entirely without aim in the mouth of the opponent. For it is not the friends who draw the picture of the lot of the punishment of the godless with the most terrible lines possible, who suggest the appearance of looking wishfully towards the godless, but Job, who paints the prosperity of the godless in such brilliant colours. On the other hand, both sides are agreed in referring prosperity and misfortune to God as final cause. And for this very reason Job thinks that אֶת־הָאֱלֹהִים בָּרַךְ, which he makes the godless, in vers. 14, 15, express in their own words, so horrible.

Ver. 16*a* is therefore to be taken as Job's judgment, and 16*b* as the moral effect which it produces upon him. וְ introduces the true relation of things; טוֹבָם signifies, as ch. xx. 21, their prosperity; and לֹא בְיָדָם (the emphatic position of בְיָדָם is to be observed) that this is not in their hand, i.e. arbitrary power, or perhaps better: that it is not by their own hand, i.e. that it is not their own work, but a gift from above, the gift even of the God whom they so shamelessly deny. That God grants them such great and lasting prosperity, is just the mystery which Job cannot help putting in its true light, but without his abhorrence of this denying of God being in the slightest degree lessened thereby. Not by their own hand, says he, do they possess such prosperity—the counsel (עֲצָה, similar to ch. v. 13, x. 3, xviii. 7: design, principle, and in general, disposition, or way of thinking) of the wicked be far from me; i.e. be it far from me that so I should speak according to their way of thinking, with which, on the contrary, I disavow all fellowship. The relation of the clauses is exactly like ch. xxii. 18, where this formula of detestation is repeated. רַחֲמָהּ is, according to the meaning, optative or precative (Ew. § 223, b, and Ges. § 126, 4*), which Hahn and Schlottm. think impossible, without assigning any reason. It is the perf. of certainty, which expresses that which is wished as a fact, but with an emotional exclamative accent. In ancient Arabic it is a rule to use the perf. as optative; and also still in modern Arabic (which often makes use of the fut. instead of the perf.), they say e.g. la cân, i.e. he must never have been! The more detestable the conduct of the prosperous towards Him to whom they owe their prosperity is, the sooner, one would think, the justice of God would be called forth to recompense them according to their deeds; but—

- 17 *How rarely is the light of the wicked put out,
And their calamity breaketh in upon them,
That He distributeth snares in his wrath,*
18 *That they become as straw before the wind,
And as chaff which the storm sweepeth away!?*
19 *“Eloah layeth up his iniquity for his children!”
May He recompense it to him that he may feel it.*
20 *May his own eyes see his ruin,
And let him drink of the glowing wrath of the Almighty.*
21 *For what careth he for his house after him,
When the number of his months is cut off?*

The interrogative כִּמָּה has here the same signification as in Ps. lxxviii. 40: how often (comp. ch. vii. 19, how long? xiii. 23, how many?), but in the sense of “how seldom?!” How seldom does what the friends preach to him come to pass, that the lamp of the wicked is put out (thus Bildad, ch. xviii. 5 sq.), and their misfortune breaks in upon them (יָבֵא, ingruit; thus Bildad, ch. xviii. 12: misfortune, אֵי, prop. pressure of suffering, stands ready for his fall), that He distributes (comp. Zophar’s “this is the portion of the wicked man,” i.e. what is allotted to him, ch. xx. 29) snares in His wrath. Hirz., Ew., Schlottm., and others, translate חֲבָלִים, after the precedent of the Targ. (עֲרֵבִין, sortes), "lots," since they understand it, after Ps. xvi. 6, of visitations of punishment allotted, and as it were measured out with a measuring-line; but that passage is to be translated, "the measuring-lines have fallen to me in pleasant places," and indeed חֶבֶל can signify the land that is allotted to one (Josh. xvii. 14, comp. 5); but the plural does not occur in that tropical sense, and if it were so intended here, חֶבְלֵיהֶם or לָהֶם חֶבְלִים might at least be expected. Rosenm., Ges., Vaih., and Carey transl. with LXX. and Jer. (ᾠδῖνες, dolores) "pains," but חֶבְלִים is the peculiar word for the writhings of those in travail (ch. xxxix. 3), which is not suited here. Schnurr. and Umbr. are nearer to the correct interpretation when they understand חֶבְלִים like פַּחִים, Ps. xi. 6, of lightning, as it were fiery strings cast down from above. If we call to mind in how many ways Bildad, ch. xviii. 8-10, has represented the end of the godless as a divinely decreed seizure, it is certainly the most natural, with Stick. and Hahn, to translate (as if it were Arabic حَبَابِلًا) "snares," to be understood after the idea, however, not of lightning, but generally of ensnaring destinies (e.g. חֶבְלֵי עֵינַי, ch. xxxvi. 8).

Both ver. 17 with its three members and ver. 18 with two, are under the control of בָּמָה. The figure of straw, or rather chopped straw (Arab. tibn, tabn), occurs only here. The figure of chaff is more frequent, e.g. Ps. i. 4. Job here doubts the fact that is distinctly affirmed in Ps. i., being urged on by Zophar's false application and superficial comprehension of the truth expressed in the opening of the Psalter. What next follows in ver. 19a is an objection of the friends in vindication of their thesis, which he anticipates and answers; perhaps the clause is to be spoken with an interrogative accent: Eloah will—so ye object—reserve his evil for his children? אֵינִי, not from אֵין, strength, wealth, as ch. xviii.

7, 12, xx. 10, xl. 16, but from נָסָה, wickedness (ch. xi. 11) and evil (ch. xv. 35), here (without making it clear which) of wickedness punishing itself by calamity, or of calamity which must come forth from the wickedness as a moral necessity [comp. on. ch. xv. 31]. That this is really the opinion of the friends: God punishes the guilt of the godless, if not in himself, at least in his children, is seen from ch. xx. 10, v. 4. Job as little as Ezekiel, ch. xviii., disputes the doctrine of retribution in itself, but that imperfect apprehension, which, in order that the necessary satisfaction may be rendered to divine justice, maintains a transfer of the punishment which is opposed to the very nature of personality and freedom: may He recompense him himself, יִדַּע, that he may feel it, i.e. repent (which would be in Arab. in a similar sense, fa-ja'lamu; יָדַע as Isa. ix. 8, Hos. ix. 7, Ezek. xxv. 14).

Ver. 20 continues in the same jussive forms; the ἄπ. γεγρ. בִּיר signifies destruction (prop. a thrust, blow), in which sense the Arab. caid (commonly: cunning) is also sometimes used. The primary signification of the root כָּד, כַּד, is to strike, push; from this, in the stems כָּד, med. Wau and med. Je, כָּד, כָּד, the most diversified turns and applications are developed; from it the signif. of בִּירֹד, ch. xli. 11, בִּירֹן, xxxix. 23, and according to Fleischer (vid. supra, pp. 263 sq.) also of בִּירֹר, are explained. Ver. 20b, as Ps. lx. 5, Obad. 16, refers to the figure of the cup of the wrath of God which is worked out by Asaph, Ps. lxxv. 9, and then by the prophets, and by the apocalyptic seer in the New Testament. The emphasis lies on the signs of the person in עֵינָיו (עֵינָיו) and יִשְׁתָּה. The rather may his own eyes see his ruin, may he himself have to drink of the divine wrath; for what is his interest (what interest has he) in his house after him? מַה puts a question with a negative meaning (hence לֹא is directly used as non); תַּפְּצִיץ, prop. inclination, corresponds exactly to the word "interest"

(quid ejus interest), as ch. xxii. 3, comp. Isa. lviii. 3, 13 (following his own interest), without being weakened to the signification, affair, πρᾶγμα, a meaning which does not occur in our poet or in Isaiah. Ver. 21*b* is added as a circumstantial clause to the question in 21*a*: while the number of his own months . . ., and the predicate, as in ch. xv. 20 (which see), is in the plur. per attractionem. Schnurr., Hirz., Umbr., and others explain: if the number of his months is drawn by lot, i.e. is run out; but הַצֵּץ as v. denom. from הָצַץ, in the signification to shake up arrows as sticks for drawing lots (Arab. سهم, an arrow and a lot, just so Persic tîr) in the helmet or elsewhere (comp. Ezek. xxi. 26), is foreign to the usage of the Hebrew language (for מַחֲצִיצִים, Judg. v. 11, signifies not those drawing lots, but the archers); besides, הַצֵּץ (pass. הִצֵּץ) would signify “to draw lots,” not “to dispose of by lot,” and “disposed of by lot” is an awkward metaphor for “run out.” Cocceius also gives the choice of returning to הַצֵּץ, ψῆφος, in connection with this derivation: calculati sive ad calculum, i.e. pleno numero egressi, which has still less ground. Better Ges., Ew., and others: if the number of his months is distributed, i.e. to him, so that he (this is the meaning according to Ew.) can at least enjoy his prosperity undisturbed within the limit of life appointed to him. By this interpretation one misses the לֵב which is wanting, and an interpretation which does not require it to be supplied is therefore to be preferred. All the divers significations of the verbs הִצֵּץ (to divide, whence Prov. xxx. 27, הִצִּץ, forming divisions, i.e. in rank and file, denom. to shoot with the arrow, Talm. to distribute, to halve, to form a partition), הִצֵּץ (to divide, ch. xl. 30; to divide in two equal parts), חָצַץ (to divide, whence حصه, portio), and חָצַץ (to separate, particularize)—to which, however, خَطَّ (to draw, write), which Ew. compares here, does not belong—are referable to the primary signification scindere, to cut through, split (whence קָטַף, an arrow, LXX. 1 Sam. xx. 20, σκίζει); accordingly the present passage is to be explained: when the number of his months is cut off (Hlgst., Hahn), or cut through, i.e. when a bound is set to the course of his life at which it ends (comp. קָטַף, of the cutting off of the thread of life, ch. vi. 9, xxvii. 8, Arab. صَرَم). Ch. xiv. 21 sq., Eccles. iii. 22, are parallels to ver. 21. Death is the end of all clear thought and perception. If therefore the godless receives the reward of his deeds, he should receive it not in his children, but in his own body during life. But this is the very thing that is too frequently found to be wanting.

- 22 *Shall one teach God knowledge,
Who judgeth those who are in heaven?*
- 23 *One dieth in his full strength,
Being still cheerful and free from care.*
- 24 *His troughs are full of milk,
And the marrow of his bones is well watered.*
- 25 *And another dieth with a sorrowing spirit,
And hath not enjoyed wealth.*
- 26 *They lie beside one another in the dust,
And worms cover them both.*

The question, ver. 22, concerns the friends. Since they maintain that necessarily and constantly virtue is rewarded by prosperity, and sin by misfortune, but without this law of the divine order of the world which is maintained by them being supported by experience: if they set themselves up as teachers of God, they will teach Him the right understanding of the conduct which is to be followed by Him as a ruler and judge of men, while nevertheless He is the Absolute One, beneath whose judicial rule not merely man, but also the heavenly spirits, are placed, and to which they must conform and bow. The verb לָמַד, instead of being construed with two acc., as in the dependent passage Isa. xl. 14, is here construed with the dat. of the person (which is not to be judged according to ch. v. 2, xix. 3, but according to διδάσκειν τινί τι, to teach one anything, beside the other prevailing construction). . With והוא a circumstantial clause begins regularly : while He, however, etc. Arnh. and Löwenth. translate : while, however, He exaltedly judges, i.e. according to a law that infinitely transcends man ; but that must have been מָרוֹם (and even thus it would still be liable to be misunderstood). Hahn (whom Olsh. is inclined to support) : but He will judge the proud, to which first the circumstantial clause, and secondly the parallels, ch. xxv. 2, xv. 15, iv. 18 (comp. Isa. xxiv. 21), from which it is evident that רָמִים signifies the heavenly beings (as Ps. lxxviii. 69, the heights of heaven), are opposed : it is a fundamental thought of this book, which abounds in allusions to the angels, that the angels, although exalted above men, are nevertheless in contrast with God imperfect, and therefore are removed neither from the possibility of sin nor the necessity of a government which holds them together in unity, and exercises a judicial authority over them. The rule of the all-exalted Judge is different from that which the three presumptuously prescribe to Him.

The one (viz. the evil-doer) dies בַּעֲצָם הָמוֹ, in ipsa sua integritate, like בעצם היום, ipso illo die ; the Arabic would be في عين, since there the eye, here the bone (comp. Uhlemann, Syr. Gramm. § 58), denote corporeality, duration, existence, and therefore identity. הָם is intended of perfect external health, as elsewhere מָחֵם ; comp. הַמִּימִים, Prov. i. 12. In ver. 23*b* the pointing שְׁלֵמָן (adj.) and שְׁלֵמָן (3 præt.) are interchanged in the Codd. ; the following verbal adjective favours the form of writing with Kametz. As to the form, however (which Röd. and Olsh. consider to be an error in writing), it is either a mixed form from שָׁמַן and שָׁלוּ with the blended meaning of both (Ew. § 106, c), to which the comparison with שָׁלִי (= שָׁלִי) is not altogether suitable, or it is formed from שָׁלִי by means of an epenthesis (as זֶלְעָה from זֶעָה, astuare, and בִּלְסָם, βάλσαμον, from בִּשָּׁם), and of similar but intensified signification; we prefer the latter, without however denying the real existence of such mixed forms (vid. on ch. xxvi. 9, xxxiii. 25). This fulness of health and prosperity is depicted in ver. 24. The ancient translators think, because the bones are mentioned in the parallel line, עֲטִינִי must also be understood of a part of the body. LXX. ἐγκατα, Jer. viscera; Targ. בִּיזִי, his breasts, *βυζία*¹ (for Hebr. שָׁרִיִּם, שָׁרִי); Syr. version gabauh (= ganbauh), his sides in regard to עֲטִמָּה, Syr. attmo = עֲטִמָּה, side, hip; Saad. audāgūhu, his jugular veins, in connection with which (not, however, by this last rendering) הָלֵב is read instead of הָלֵב: his bowels, etc., are full of fat.² But the assumption that עֲטִינִי must be a part of the body is without satisfactory ground (comp. against it e.g. ch. xx. 17, and for it xx. 11); and Schlottm. very correctly observes, that in the contrast in connection with the representation of the well-watered marrow one expects a reference to a rich nutritious drink. To this expectation corresponds

² Gesenius in his Thes. corrects the אֹרְאָנָה which was found in Saadia's manuscript translation to אֹרְאָעָה, אֹרְאָעָה, which is intended to mean repositoria ejus, but is really not Arabic; whereas אֹרְאָנָה is the correct plur. of وَجْج: his jugular veins, which occurs not merely of horses, but also of animals and men. Saadia, with reference to the following מִלְּאֵי הָלֵב, has thought of the metaphorical phrase حَلَبُ أَوْدَاجِهِ: "he has milked his jugular vein," i.e. he has, as it were, drawn the blood from his jugular veins = eum jugulavit, vid. Bibliotheca Arabo-Sicula, p. ٥٦٣: "and with the freshly milked juice of the jugular veins, viz. of the enemy (ومن حلب الأوداج), our infant ready to be weaned is nourished in the midst of the tumult of battle, as soon as he is weaned." The meaning of Saadia's translation is then: his jugular veins are filled with fresh blood, swollen with fulness of blood.—FL.

the translation: "his resting-places (i.e. of his flocks) are full of milk," after the Arab. ^{عُطْن} or ^{مَعَطْن}, which was not first compared by Schultens and Reiske (epaulia), but even by Abulwalid, Aben-Ezra, and others. But since the reference of what was intended to be said of the cattle at the watering-places to the places where the water is, possesses no poetic beauty, and the Hebrew language furnished the poet with an abundance of other words for pastures and meadows, it is from the first more probable that ^{עֲטִינֵי} are large troughs,—like Talm. ^{מַעְטָן}, a trough, in which the unripe olives were laid in order that they might become tender and give forth oil, that they may then be ready for the oil-press (^{בַּד}), and ^{עָטַן} denotes this laying in itself,—and indeed either milk-tubs or milk-pails (^{שְׁחוּלְבֵין לַחֹבֵן}), or with Kimchi (who rightly characterizes this as more in accordance with the prosperous condition which is intended to be described), the troughs for the store of milk, which also accords better with the meaning of the verb ^{עָטַן}, ^{עָטַן}, to lay in, confire.¹ From the abundance of nutriment in ver. 24*a*, the description passes over in 24*b* to the well-nourished condition of the rich man himself in consequence of this abundance. מֶרֶג (Arab. مَرَج, or even نَج, as נָה = נָה, naurag = מֶרֶג) is the marrow in the bones, e.g. the spinal marrow, but also the brain as the marrow of the head (Psychol. p. 275). The bones (Prov. iii. 8), or as it is here more exactly expressed, their marrow, is watered, when the body is inwardly filled with vigour, strength, and health; Isaiah, ch. lviii. 11, fills up the picture more (as a well-watered garden), and carries it still further in ch. lxvi. 14 (thy bones shall blossom like a tender herb). The counterpart now follows with נֶחֱם (and the other, like ch. i. 16). The other (viz. the righteous) dies with a sorrowful soul (comp. Job's lament, ch. vii. 11, x. i.), i.e. one which is called to experience the bitterness of a suffering life; he dies and has not enjoyed בְּמוֹכָה, any of the wealth (with partitive Beth, as Ps. cxli. 4, comp. supra, ch. vii. 13), has had no portion in the enjoyment of it (comp. Job's lament, ch. ix. 25). In death they are then both, unrighteous and righteous, alike, as the Preacher saith: מָקֵרָה אֶחָד comes upon the wise as upon the fool, Eccles. ii. 15, comp. ix. 2 sq. They lie together in the dust, i.e. the dust of the grave (vid. on ch. xix. 25), and worms cover them. What then is become of the law of retribution in the present world, drinking-troughs, after or even before drinking from them. On the other hand, عَطِن impf. j' attinu, also j' attunu, n. act. 'attn, a v. trans. used by the dresser of skins: to lay the skins in the tan or ooze (French, confire; low Latin, tanare, tannare, whence French, tanner, to tan, tan, the bark) until they are ready for dressing, and the hairs will easily scrape off. Hence عَطِن impf. j' attanu, n. act. 'attan, a v. intrans. used of skins: to become tender by lying in the ooze, and to smell musty, to stink, which is then transferred to men and animals: to stink like a skin in the ooze, comp. situs, mould, mildew, rust.—FL. Starting from the latter signification, macerare pellem, Lee explains: his bottles (viz. made of leather); and Carey: his half-dressed skins (because the store of milk is so great that he cannot wait for the preparation of the leather for the bottles); but the former is impossible, the latter out of taste, and both are far-fetched.

which the friends maintained with such rigid pertinacity, and so regardless of the deep wound they were inflicting on Job ?

27 Behold I know your thoughts

And the stratagems, with which ye overpower me !

28 When ye say : Where is the house of the tyrant,

And where the pavilions of the wicked—:

29 Have ye not asked those who travel,

Their memorable things ye could surely not disown :

30 That the wicked was spared in the day of calamity,

In the day of the outburst of wrath they were led away.

31 Who liketh to declare to him his way to his face ?

And hath he done aught, who will recompense it to him ?

Their thoughts which he sees through, are their secret thoughts that he is such an evil-doer reaping the reward of his deeds. מְזִמָּה (which occurs both of right measures, good wise designs, Prov. v. 2, viii. 12, and of artful devices, malicious intrigues, Prov. xii. 2, xiv. 17, comp. the definition of בְּעֵל מְזִמָּה, Prov. xxiv. 8) is the name he gives to the delicately developed reasoning with which they attack him ; קָמָם

(comp. Arab. تَحَمَّس, to act harshly, violently, and overbearingly) is construed with עָל in the sense of forcing, with the design of overcoming. In ver. 28, which is the antecedent to ver. 29, beginning with כִּי תֹאמְרוּ (as ch. xix. 28), he refers to words of the friends like ch. viii. 22, xv. 34, xviii. 15, 21. נָדִיב is prop. the noble man, whose heart impels

Psychol. p. 195 ; then, however, since the notion takes the reverse way of generosus, the noble man (princely) by birth and station, with which the secondary notion of pride and abuse of power, therefore of a despot or tyrant, is easily as here (parall. רָשָׁעִים, comp. עָשִׂיר, Isa. liii. 9, with the same word in the parallel) combined (just so in Isa. xiii. 2, and similarly at least above, ch. xii. 21,—an anomaly of name and conduct, which will be in the future put aside, according to Isa. xxxii. 5). It is not admissible to understand the double question as antithetical, with Wolfson, after Prov. xiv. 11; for the interrogative אֵיךְ is not appropriate to the house of the נָדִיב, in the proper sense of the word. Ver. 28^b, מִשְׁכְּנוֹת is not an externally but internally multiplying plur.; perhaps the poet by בֵּית intends a palace in the city, and by אֹהֶל מִשְׁכְּנוֹת a tent among the wandering tribes, rendered prominent by its spaciousness and the splendour of the establishment.¹ Job thinks the friends reason a priori since they inquire thus; the permanent fact of experience is quite different, as they can learn from עֲבָרֵי דֶרֶךְ, travellers, i.e. here: people who have travelled much, and therefore are well acquainted with the stories of human destinies. The Piel נִבֵּר, proceeding from the radical meaning to gaze fixedly, is an ἐναντιόσημον, since it signifies both to have regard to, ch. xxxiv. 19, and to disown, Deut. xxxii. 27; here it is to be translated: their אֵלֶּה ye cannot nevertheless deny, ignore (as Arab. أَنْكَرُ and نَكَرُ). אֵלֶּה are tokens, here: remarkable things, and indeed the remarkable histories related by them; آيَاتٌ (collective plur. آيَاتُ), signs, is also similarly used in the signification of عِبْرَةٌ, example, historical teaching.

That the וְיָ, ver. 30, as in ver. 28, introduces the view of the friends, and is the antecedent clause to ver. 31 : quod (si) vos dicitis, in tempora cladis per iram divinam immissæ servari et nescium futuri velut pecudem eo deduci improbum (Böttcher, de inf. § 76), has in the double לְ an apparent support, which is not to be denied, especially in regard to ch. xxxviii. 23 ; it is, however, on account of the omission of the indispensable הָאָמַר in this instance, an explanation which does violence to the words. The וְיָ, on the contrary, introduces that which the accounts of the travellers affirm. Further, the לְ in לַיּוֹם indicates here not the terminus ad quem, but as in לָעֶרֶב, in the evening, the terminus quo. And the verb חָשַׁךְ, cohibere, signifies here to hold back from danger, as ch. xxxiii. 18, therefore to preserve uninjured. Ew. translates ver. 30b erroneously : “in the day when the floods of wrath come on.” How tame would this הֵבֵל, “to be led near,” be ! This Hoph. signifies elsewhere to be brought and conducted, and occurs in ver. 32, as in Isa. lv. 12 and elsewhere, of an honourable escort ; here, in accordance with the connection : to be led away out of the danger (somewhat as Lot and his family by the escort of angels). At the time, when streams of wrath (עֲבִירָה, the overflowing of vexation = outburst of wrath, like the Arab. عبرة, the overflowing of the eye = tears) go forth, they remain untouched : they escape them, as being under a special, higher protection.¹ Ver. 31 is commonly taken as a reflection on the exemption of the evil-doer : God's mode of action is exalted above all human scrutiny, although it is not reconcilable with the idea of justice, ch. ix. 12, xxiii. 13. But the מי יִשְׁלֶם-לוֹ, who will recompense it to him, which, used of man in relation to God, has no suitable meaning, and must therefore mean : who, after God has left the evil-doer unpunished—for which, however, הוּא עֲשָׂה would be an unsuitable expression—shall recompense him, the evil-doer? is opposed to it. Therefore, against Ew., Hirz., and Hlgst., it must with most expositors be supposed that ver. 31 is a reflection referable not to God, but to the evil-doer : so powerful is the wicked generally, that no one can oppose his pernicious doings and call him to account for them, much less that any one would venture to repay him according to his desert when he has brought anything to a completion (הוּא עֲשָׂה), intentionally thus seriously expressed, as elsewhere of God, e.g. Isa. xxxviii. 15). In the next strophe, that which is gathered from the accounts of travellers is continued, and is then followed by a declamatory summing up.

32 *And he is brought to the grave,
And over the tomb he still keepeth watch.*

33 *The clods of the valley are sweet to him,
And all men follow after him,
As they preceded him without number.*

34 *And how will ye comfort me so vainly !
Your replies are and remain perfidy.*

During life removed at the time of dire calamity, this unapproachable evil-doer is after his death carried to the grave with all honour (יִבָּל, comp. x. 19), and indeed to a splendid tomb ; for, like מִשְׁכְּנֹת above, קְבֻרֹת is also an amplificative plural. It is certainly the most natural to refer יִשְׁקָד, like יִבָּל, to the deceased. The explanation : and over the tomb one keeps watch (Böttch., Hahn, Röd., Olsh.), is indeed in itself admissible, since that which serves as the efficient subject is often left unexpressed (Gen. xlviii. 2; 2 Kings ix. 21; Isa. liii. 9; comp. supra, on ch. xviii. 18); but that, according to the prevalent usage of the language, ישקד would denote only a guard of honour at night, not also in the day, and that for clearness it would have required לְיָמֵינוּ instead of לְיָמֵינוּ, are considerations which do not favour this explanation, for שָׁקַד signifies to watch, to be active, instead of sleeping or resting; and moreover, the placing of guards of honour by graves is an assumed, but not proved, custom of antiquity. Nevertheless, ישקד might also in general denote the watchful, careful tending of the grave, and the maqâm (the tomb) of one who is highly honoured has, according to Moslem custom, servants (châdimîn) who are appointed for this duty. But though the translation "one watches" should not be objected to on this ground, the preference is to be given to a commendable rendering which makes the deceased the subject of ישקד. Raschi's explanation does not, however, commend itself: "buried in his own land, he also in death still keeps watch over the heaps of sheaves." The LXX. translates similarly, ἐπὶ σωρῶν, which Jerome improperly, but according to a right sentiment, translates, in congerie mortuorum. For after the preceding mention of the pomp of burial, לְיָמֵינוּ, which certainly signifies a heap of sheaves in ch. v. 26, is favoured by the assumption of its signifying a sepulchral heap, with reference to which also in that passage (where interment is likewise the subject of discourse) the expression is chosen. Haji

Gaon observes that the dome (قبة, קֶבֶה, the dome and the sepulchral monument vaulted over by it)¹ erected over graves according to Arab custom is intended; and Aben-Ezra says, that not exactly this, but in general the grave-mound formed of earth, etc., is to be understood. In reality, גִּרְשִׁי (from the verb גִּרַשׁ, cumulare, commonly used in the Talmud and Aramaic) signifies cumulus, in the most diversified connections, which in Arabic are distributed among the verbs جَدَس, كَدَس, and جَدَث, especially tumulus, Arab. جَدَث (broader pronunciation جَذَف). If by grave-mound an actual mound with the grave upon it can be understood, a beautiful explanation is presented which accords with the preference of the Beduin for being buried on an eminence, in order that even in death he may be surrounded by his relations; and as it were be able still to overlook their encampment: the one who should have had a better lot is buried in the best place of the plain, in an insignificant grave; the rich man, however, is brought up to an eminence and keeps watch on his elevated tomb, since from this eminence as from a watch-tower he even in death, as it were, enjoys the wide prospect which delighted him so while living.¹ But the signification collis cannot be supported; גִּרְשִׁי signifies the hill which is formed by the grave itself, and ver. 33 indeed directs us to the wady as the place of burial, not to the hill. But if גִּרְשִׁי is the grave-mound, it is also not possible with Schlottm. to think of the pictures on the wall and images of the deceased, as they are found in the Egyptian vaults (although in ch. iii. 14 we recognised an allusion to the pyramids), for it cannot then be a גִּרְשִׁי in the strict sense that is spoken of; the word ought, like the Arabic حَدَث (which the Arab. translation of the New Testament in the London Polyglott uses of the μνημείον of Jesus), with an obliteration of its original signification, to have been used in the general signification sepulcrum. This would be possible, but it need not be supposed. Job's words are the pictorial antithesis to Bildad's assertion, ch. xviii. 17, that the godless man dies away without trace or memorial; it is not so, but as may be heard from the mouth of people who have experience in the world: he keeps watch over his tomb, he continues to watch although asleep, since he is continually brought to remembrance by the monument built over his tomb. A keeping watch that no one approaches the tomb disrespectfully (Ew.), is not to be thought of. שָׁקֵר is a relative negation of the sleep of death: he is dead, but in a certain manner he continues to live, viz. in the monument planting forward his memory, which it remains for the imagination to conceive of as a mausoleum, or weapons, or other votive offerings hung upon the walls, etc. In connection with such honour, which follows him even to and beyond death, the clods of the valley (est ei terra levis) are sweet (מִתְקִין is accentuated with Mercha, and לֵב without Makkeph with little-Rebia) to him; and if death in itself ought to be accounted an evil, he has shared the common fate which all men after him will meet, and which all before him have met; it is the common end of all made sweet to him by the pageantry of his burial and his after-fame. Most modern expositors (Ew., Hirz., Umbr., Hlgst., Welte) understand the יִמְשֵׁךְ, which is used, certainly, not in the transitive signification: to draw after one's self, but in the intransitive: to draw towards (LXX. ἀπελεύσεται), as Judg. iv. 6 (vid. Ges. Thes.), of an imitative treading of the same way; but כָּל-אֹדְם would then be an untrue hyperbole, by which Job would expose himself to the attack of his adversaries.

In ver. 34 Job concludes his speech; the Waw of וְאֵיךְ, according to the idea (as e.g. the Waw in וְאֵיךְ, Isa. xliii. 12), is an inferential ergo. Their consolation, which is only available on condition of penitence, is useless ; and their replies, which are intended to make him an evil-doer against the testimony of his conscience, remain מעל. It is not necessary to construe : and as to your answers, only מעל remains. The predicate stands per attractionem in the sing. : their answers, reduced to their true value, leave nothing behind but מעל, end in מעל, viz. באלהים, Josh. xxii. 22, perfidious sinning against God, i.e. on account of the sanctimonious injustice and uncharitableness with which they look suspiciously on him.

Job has hitherto answered the accusations of the friends, which they express in ever-increasingly terrible representations of the end of the godless, presenting only the terrible side of their dogma of the justice of God, with a steadfast attestation of his innocence, and with the ever-increasing hope of divine vindication against human accusation. In him was manifest that faith which, being thrust back by men, clings to God, and, thrust back by God Himself, soars aloft from the present wrath of God to His faithfulness and mercy. The friends, however, instead of learning in Job's spiritual condition to distinguish between the appearance and the reality in this confidence, which comes back to itself, see in it only a constant wilful hardening of himself against their exhortations to penitence. It does not confound them, that he over whom, according to their firm opinion, the sword of God's vengeance hangs, warns them of that same sword, but only confirms them still more in their conviction, that they have to do with one who is grievously self-deluded.

Zophar has painted anew the end of the evil-doer in the most hideous colours, in order that Job might behold himself in this mirror, and be astonished at himself. We see also, from the answer of Job to Zophar's speech, that the passionate excitement which Job displayed at first in opposition to the friends has given place to a calmer tone ; he has already got over the first impression of disappointed expectation, and the more confidently certain of the infallibility of divine vindication he becomes, the more does he feel raised above his accusers. He now expects no further comfort ; careful attention to what he has to say shall henceforth be his consolation. He will also complain against and of men no more, for he has long since ceased to hope for anything for himself from men ; his vexation concerns the objective indefensibility of that which his opponents maintain as a primeval law of the divine government in the world. The maxim that godlessness always works its own punishment by a calamitous issue, is by no means supported by experience. One sees godless persons who are determined to know nothing of God, and are at the same time prosperous. It is not to be said that God treasures up the punishment they have deserved for their children. The godless ought rather to bear the punishment themselves, since the destiny of their children no longer concerns them after they have enjoyed their fill of life. That law is therefore a precept which human shortsightedness has laid down for God, but one by which, however, He is not guided. The godless who have lived prosperously all their days, and the righteous who have experienced only sorrow, share the common lot of death. One has only to ask persons who have had experience of the world : they can relate instances of notorious sinners who maintained their high position until death, and who, without being overtaken by divine judgments, and without human opposition and contradiction, were carried in honour to the grave, and their memory is immortalized by the monuments erected over their tomb. From this Job infers that the connection into which the friends bring his suffering with supposed guilt, is a false one, and that all their answers are, after all, reducible to an unjust and uncharitable judgment, by which they attack (מַעֲלִים) God.

Job has more than once given expression to the thought, that a just distribution of prosperity and misfortune is not to be found in the world, ch. ix. 22-24, xii. 6. But now for the first time he designedly brings it forward in reply to the friends, after he has found every form of assertion of his innocence unavailing, and their behaviour towards him with their dogma is become still more and more inconsiderate and rash. Job sins in this speech ; but in order to form a correct judgment of this sinning, two things must be attended to. Job does not revel in the contradiction in which this lasting fact of experience stands to the justice of divine retribution, he had rather be ignorant of it ; for he has no need of it in order, in spite of his affliction, to be able to hold fast the consciousness of his innocence. No indeed ! if he thinks of this mystery he is perplexed, and shuddering comes over him, ch. xxi. 6. And when he depicts the prosperity of sinners, he expresses his horror of the sins of such prosperous men in the words : The counsel of the ungodly be far from me ! (ch. xxi. 16), in order that it may not be erroneously imagined that he lusts after such prosperity.

If we compare Zophar's and Job's speeches one with another, we are obliged to say, that relatively the greater right is on the side of Job. True, the Scriptures confirm what Zophar says of the destruction of the evil-doer in innumerable passages ; and this calamitous end of one who has long been prosperous and defiant, is the solution by which the Old Testament Scriptures (Ps. xxxvii. lxxiii. ; Jer. xii. 1-3 ; Hab. i. 13-ii.) remove the stumbling-block of the mysterious phenomenon of the prosperity of the evil-doer. But if we bear in mind that this solution is insufficient, so long as that calamitous end is regarded only outwardly, and with reference to the present world,—that the solution only becomes satisfactory when, as in the book of Ecclesiastes, in reply to a similar doubt to that which Job expresses (Eccles. vii. 15, viii. 14), the end is regarded as the end of all, and as the decision of a final judgment which sets all contradictions right,—that, however, neither Zophar nor Job know anything of a decision beyond death, but regard death itself as the end whither human destiny and divine retribution tend, without being capable of any further distinction: we cannot deny that Job is most in the right in placing the prosperous life and death of the godless as based upon the incontrovertible facts of experience, in opposition to Zophar's primeval exceptionless law of the terrible end of the godless. The speeches of Zophar and of Job are both true and false,—both one-sided, and therefore mutually supplementary. The real final end of the evil-doer is indeed none other than Zophar describes; and the temporal prosperity of the evil-doer, lasting often until death, is really a frequent phenomenon. If, however, we consider further, that Job is not able to deny the occurrence of such examples of punishment, such revelations of the retributive justice of God, as those which Zophar represents as occurring regularly and without exception; that, however, on the other hand, exceptional instances undeniably do exist, and the friends are obliged to be blind to them, because otherwise the whole structure of their opposition would fall in,—it is manifest that Job is nearer to the truth than Zophar. For it is truer that the retributive justice of God is often, but by far not always, revealed in the present world and outwardly, than that it always becomes manifest.

Wherein, then, does Job's sin in this speech consist? Herein, that he altogether ignores the palpably just distribution of human destinies, which does occur frequently enough. In this he becomes unjust towards his opponent, and incapable of convincing him. From it, it appears as though in the divine government there is not merely a preponderance of what is mysterious, of what is irreconcilable with divine justice, but as though justice were altogether contradicted.

The reproach with which he reproaches his opponents: Shall one teach God understanding? is one which also applies to himself; for when he says that God, if He punishes, must visit punishment upon the evil-doer himself, and not on his children, it is an unbecoming dictation with regard to God's doings. We should be mistaken in supposing that the poet, in ch. xxi. 19-21, brings forward a concealed contradiction to the Mosaic doctrine of retribution; nowhere in the Old Testament, not even in the Mosaic law, is it taught, that God visits the sins of the fathers on the children, while He allows them themselves to go free, Ex. xx. 5, comp. Deut. xxiv. 16, Ezek. xviii., Jer. xxxi. 29 sq. What Job asserts, that the sinner himself must endure the punishment of his sins, not his children instead of him, is true; but the thought lying in the background, that God does not punish where He ought to punish, is sinful. Thus here Job again falls into the error, which he must by and by penitently acknowledge and confess, of speaking unbecomingly of God: the God of the future is again vanished from him behind the clouds of temptation, and he is unable to understand and love the God of the present; He is a mystery to him, the incomprehensibility of which causes him pain. "The joyous thought of the future, which a little before struggled forth, again vanishes, because the present, into the abyss of which he is again drawn down, has remained perfectly dark the whole time, and as yet no bridge has been revealed crossing from this side to that."

THE THIRD COURSE OF THE CONTROVERSY.—

CHAP. XXII.—XXVI.

Eliphaz' Third Speech.—Chap. xxii.Schema : 8. 8. 4. 6. 8. 4. 10. 10.

[Then began Eliphaz the Temanite, and said :]

2 *Is a man profitable unto God?No, indeed ! the intelligent man is profitable to himself.*3 *Hath the Almighty any profit if thou art righteous.Or gain if thou strivest to walk uprightly?*4 *Will He reprove thee for thy fear of God,Will He go with thee into judgment?*5 Is not thy wickedness great,Thine iniquities infinite?

The verb פָּנָה, in the signification to be profitable, is peculiar to the book of Job (although also פָּנָה and פִּנְיָה elsewhere, according to its primary signification, does not differ from מוֹעִיל, מוֹעִילָה, by which it is explained by Kimchi) ; the correct development of the notion of this verb is to be perceived from the Hiph., which occurs in ver. 21 in this speech of Eliphaz (vid. Ges. Thes.) : it signifies originally, like שָׁכַן, שָׁכַן, to rest, dwell, especially to dwell beside one another, then to become accustomed to one another (comp. שָׁכֵן, a neighbour, and שָׁכֵן, a friend, confidant), and to assist one another, to be serviceable, to be profitable ; we can say both פָּנִיתִי, I have profit, ch. xxxiv. 9, and פָּנָה, it is profitable, ch. xv. 3, xxxv. 3, here twice with a personal subj., and first followed by לְ, then with the עַל, usual also elsewhere in later prose (e.g. מוֹבַעַל, 1 Chron. xiii. 2, comp. supra, ch. x. 3, to be pleasant) and poetry, which gladly adopts Aramaisms (as here and Ps. xvi. 6, שָׂפַר עַל, well-pleased), instead of ל, whence here עָלִימוֹ, as ch. xx. 23, pathetic for עָלִי. The question, which is intended as a negative, is followed by the negative answer (which establishes its negative meaning) with כִּי; מִשְׁפִּיל is, like Ps. xiv. 2, the intelligent, who wills and does what is good, with an insight into the nature of the extremes in morality, as in Prov. i. 3 independent morality which rests not merely on blind custom is called מוֹסֵר הַשֶּׁבֶל ל. הִיָּה חֶפֶץ ל, it is to the interest of any one (different from 1 Sam. xv. 22, vid. on ch. xxi. 21), and הִיָּה בָצַע ל, it is to the gain of any one (prop. the act of cutting, cutting off, i.e. what one pulls towards one), follow as synonyms of סָבָן. On the Aramaizing doubling of the first radical in the Hiph. תָּתַם (instead of תָּתַם), vid. Ges. § 67, rem. 8, comp. 3. It is translated an lucrum (ei) si integras facias vias tuas. The meaning of the whole strophe is mainly determined according to the rendering of הַמִּירָאָתָךְ (like הַמְבִינָתָךְ, ch. xxxix. 26, with Metheg retained, and with Munach by the tone-syllable of the Dechî; vid. Psalter, ii. 491, Anm. 1). If the suff. is taken objectively (from fear of thee), e.g. Hirz., we have the following line of thought: God is neither benefited by human virtue nor injured by human sin, so that when He corrects the sinner He is turning danger from himself; He neither rewards the godly because He is benefited by his piety, nor punishes the sinner because by his sinning he threatens Him with injury. Since, therefore, if God chastises a man, the reason of it is not to be found in any selfish purpose of God, it must be in the sin of the man, which is on its own account worthy of punishment. But the logical relation in which ver. 5 stands to ver. 4 does suit this: perhaps from fear of thee . . .? no, rather because of thy many and great sins! Hahn is more just to this relation when he explains: "God has no personal harm to expect from man, so that, somewhat from fear, to prevent him from being injurious, He should have any occasion to torment him with sufferings unjustly." But if the personal profit, which is denied, is one that grows out of the piety of the man, the personal harm, which is denied as one which God by punishment will keep far from Himself, is to be thought of as growing out of the sin of the man; and the logical relation of ver. 5 to 4 is not suited to this, for ver. 5 assigns the reason of the chastisement to the sin, and denies, as it runs, not merely any motive whatever in connection with the sin, but that the reason can lie in the opposite of sin, as it appears according to Job's assertion that, although guiltless, he is still suffering from the wrath of God.

Thus, then, the suff. of המיראתך is to be taken subjectively: on account of thy fear of God, as Eliphaz has used יראתך twice already, ch. iv. 6, xv. 4. By this subjective rendering vers. 4 and 5 form a true antithesis: Does God perhaps punish thee on account of thy fear of God? Does He go (on that account) with thee into judgment? No (it would be absurd to suppose that); therefore thy wickedness must be great (in proportion to the greatness of thy suffering), and thy misdeeds infinitely many. If we now look at what precedes, we shall have to put aside the thought drawn into vers. 2 and 3 by Ewald (and also by Hahn): whether God, perhaps with the purpose of gaining greater advantage from piety, seeks to raise it by unjustly decreed sufferings; for this thought has nothing to indicate it, and is indeed certainly false, but on account of the force of truth which lies in it (there is a decreeing of suffering for the godly to raise their piety) is only perplexing.

First of all, we must inquire how it is that Eliphaz begins his speech thus. All the exhortations to penitence in which the three exhaust themselves, rebound from Job without affecting him. Even Eliphaz, the oldest among them, full of a lofty, almost prophetic consciousness, has with the utmost solicitude allured and terrified him, but in vain. And it is the cause of God which he brings against him, or rather his own well-being that he seeks, without making an impression upon him. Then he reminds him that God is in Himself the all-sufficient One; that no advantage accrues to Him from human uprightness, since His nature, existing before and transcending all created things, can suffer neither diminution nor increase from the creature; that Job therefore, since he remains inaccessible to that well-meant call to penitent humiliation, has refused not to benefit Him, but himself; or, what is the reverse side of this thought (which is not, however, expressed), that he does no injury to Him, only to himself. And yet in what except in Job's sin should this decree of suffering have its ground? If it is a self-contradiction that God should chastise a man because he fears Him, there must be sin on the side of Job; and indeed, since the nature of the sin is to be measured according to the nature of the suffering, great and measureless sin. This logical necessity Eliphaz now regards as real, without further investigation, by opening out this bundle of sins in the next strophe, and reproaching Job directly with that which Zophar, ch. xx. 19-21, aiming at Job, has said of the רשע. In the next strophe he continues, with כי explic.:

- 6 *For thou distrainedst thy brother without cause,
And the clothes of the naked thou strippedst off.*
- 7 *Thou gavest no water to the languishing,
And thou refusedst bread to the hungry.*
- 8 *And the man of the arm—the land was his,
And the honourable man dwelt therein.*
- 9 *Thou sentest widows away empty,
And the arms of the orphan are broken.*

The reason of exceeding great suffering must be exceeding great sins. Job must have committed such sins as are here cited; therefore Eliphaz directly attributes guilt to him, since he thinks thus to tear down the disguise of the hypocrite. The strophe contains no reference to the Mosaic law: the compassionate Mosaic laws respecting duties towards widows and orphans, and the poor who pledge their few and indispensable goods, may have passed before the poet's mind; but it is not safe to infer it from the expression. As specific Mohammedan commandments among the wandering tribes even in the present day have no sound, so the poet dare not assume, in connection with the characters of his drama, any knowledge, of the Sinaitic law; and of this he remains conscious throughout: their standpoint is and remains that of the Abrahamic faith, the primary commands (later called the ten commands of piety, el-felâhh) of which were amply sufficient for stigmatizing that to which this strophe gives prominence as sin. It is only the force of the connection of the matter here which gives the futt. which follow כִּי a retrospective meaning. הִבֵּל is connected either with the accusative of the thing which is taken as a pledge, as in the law, which meets a response in the heart, Ex. xxii. 25 sq.; or with the accus. of the person who is distrained, as here אֶהְיֶה; or, if this is really (as Bär asserts) a mistake that has gained a footing, which has Codd. and old printed editions against it, rather אֶהְיֶה. LXX., Targ., Syr., and Jer. read the word as plural. עֲרוּמִים (from עָרוֹם), like γυμνοί, James ii. 15, nudi (comp. Seneca, de beneficiis, v. 13: si quis male vestitum et pannosum videt, nudum se vidisse dicit), are, according to our mode of expression, the half-naked, only scantily (vid. Isa. xx. 2) clothed.

Ver. 8. The man of the arm, יָרֵעַ, is in Eliphaz' mind Job himself. He has by degrees acquired the territory far and wide for himself, by having brought down the rightful possessors by open violence (ch. xx. 19), or even by cunning and unfeeling practices, and is not deterred by any threat of a curse (ch. xv. 28): לוֹ הָאָרֶץ, he looked upon it as his, and his it must become; and since with his possessions his authority increased, he planted himself firmly in it, filled it out alone, like a stout fellow who takes the room of all others away. Umbr., Hahn, and others think Job's partiality for power and rank is described in ver. 8; but both assertions read straightforward, without any intimation of co-operation. The address is here only suspended, in order to describe the man as he was and is. The all-absorbing love of self regulated his dealings. In possession of the highest power and highest rank, he was not easy of access. Widows and orphans, that they might not perish, were obliged to turn suppliantly to him. But the widows he chased away with empty hands, and the arms of the orphans were crushed. From the address a turn is also here taken to an objective utterance turned from the person addressed, intended however for him; the construction is like מצות יאכל, unleavened bread is eaten, Ex. xiii. 7, according to Ew. § 295, b. The arms are not conceived of as stretched out for help (which would rather be יָרַע), nor as demanding back their perverted right, but the crushing of the arms, as Ps. xxxvii. 17, Ezek. xxx. 22, and frequently implies a total destruction of every power, support, and help, after the analogy of the Arabic phrase compared by Ges. in his Thes. pp. 268*b*, 433*b*. The arm, זֶרַע (ذراع, often عَضْد or سَاعِد), signifies power, ch. xl. 9, Ps. lxxvii. 16; force and violence, ver. 8, ch. xxxv. 9; self-help, and help from without, Ps. lxxxiii. 9 (comp. Ps. xlv. 4). Whatever the orphans possessed of goods, honour, and help still available, is not merely broken, it is beaten into fragments.

10 *Therefore snares are round about thee,
And fear terrifieth thee suddenly;*

11. *Or perceivest thou not the darkness,
And the overflow of waters, which covereth thee?*

On account of this inhuman mode of action by which he has challenged the punishment of justice, snares are round about him (comp. Bildad's picture of this fate of the evil-doer, ch. xviii. 8-10), destruction encompasses him on every side, so that he sees no way out, and must without any escape succumb to it. And the approaching ruin makes itself known to him time after time by terrors which come suddenly upon him and disconcert him; so that his outward circumstances being deranged and his mind discomposed, he has already in anticipation to taste that which is before him. In ver. 11, לֹא תִרְאֶה is by no means to be taken as an eventual circumstantial clause, whether it is translated affirmatively: or darkness (covers thee), that thou canst not see; or interrogatively: or does darkness (surround thee), that thou seest not? In both cases the verb in the principal clause is wanting; apart from the new turn, which אִי introduces, being none, it would then have to be explained with Löwenthal: or has the habit of sinning already so dulled thy feeling and darkened thine eye, that thou canst not perceive the enormity of thy transgression? But this is a meaning forced from the words which they are not capable of; it must have been at least אִי הִשָּׁךְ בְּעֵדֶךָ, or something similar. Since אִי הִשָּׁךְ (to be accented without Makkeph with Mûnach, Dechî) cannot form a principal clause of itself, תִּרְאֶה is without doubt the verb belonging to it: or (אִי as ch. xvi. 3) seest thou not darkness? Because, according to his preceding speeches, Job does not question the magnitude of his sufferings, but acknowledges them in all their fearfulness; therefore Hahn believes it must be explained: or shouldst thou really not be willing to see thy sins, which encompass thee as thick dark clouds, which cover thee as floods of water? The two figures, however, can only be understood of the destruction which entirely shrouds Job in darkness, and threatens to drown him. But destruction, in the sense in which Eliphaz asks if Job does not see it, is certainly intended differently to what it was in Job's complaints. Job complains of it as being unmerited, and therefore mysterious; Eliphaz, on the other hand, is desirous that he should open his eyes that he may perceive in this darkness of sorrow, this flood of suffering, the well-deserved punishment of his heinous sins, and anticipate the worst by penitence. לֹא תִבְסֶךְ is a relative clause, and belongs logically also to חָשֶׁךְ, comp. Isa. lx. 2, where שָׂפַעַת is also found in ver. 6 (from שָׂפַע, abundare; comp. שָׁפַע, ch. xx. 22). Eliphaz now insinuates that Job denies the special providence of God, because he doubts the exceptionless, just government of God. In the second strophe he has explained his affliction as the result of his uncharitableness; now he explains it as the result of his unbelief, which is now become manifest.

See but the head of the stars, how exalted!

13 So then thou thinkest: "What doth God know?

Can He judge through the thick cloud?

14 Clouds veil Him that He seeth not,

And in the vault of heaven He walketh at His pleasure."

Because Job has denied the distribution of worldly fortune, of outward prosperity and adversity, according to the law of the justice that recompenses like for like, Eliphaz charges him with that unbelief often mentioned in the Psalms (lxxiii. 11, xciv. 7; comp. Isa. xxix. 15, Ezek. viii. 12), which denies to the God in heaven, as Epicurus did to the gods who lead a blessed life in the spaces between the worlds, a knowledge of earthly things, and therefore the preliminary condition for a right comprehension of them. The mode of expression here is altogether peculiar. זֹכֶה שָׁמַיִם is not acc. loci, as the like accusatives in combination with the verb שָׁחַן, Isa. lvii. 15, may be taken: the substantival clause would lead one to expect בְּזֹכֶה, or better בְּזִכְּתִי (ch. xi. 8); it is rather (similar to ch. xi. 8) nomin. prædicati: Eloah is the height of the heavens = heaven-high, as high as the heavens, therefore certainly highly, and indeed very highly, exalted above this earth. In this sense it is continued with Waw explic.: and behold (= behold then) the head of the stars, that, or how (יִי as in Gen. xlix. 15, 1 Sam. xiv. 29, quod = quam) exalted they are. יִרְאֶה has Asla (Kadma) in correct texts, and רָמוֹ is written רָמוֹ (rāmmu) with a so-called Dag. affectuosum (Olsh. § 83, b). It may be received as certain that רֹאשׁ, the head (vertex), beside רִאֶה (not סִפֵּר), does not signify the sum (Aben-Ezra). But it is questionable whether the genitive that follows רֹאשׁ is gen. partitivus: the highest among the stars (Ew., Hirz., Schlottm.), or gen. epexegeticus: the head, i.e. (in relation to the rest of the universe) the height, which is formed by the stars, or even which they occupy (Ges. cælum stellatum); the partitive rendering is to be preferred, for the Semitic perception recognises, as the plural שָׁמַיִם implies, nearer and more distant celestial spheres. The expression "head of the stars" is therefore somewhat like fastigium cæli (the extreme height, i.e. the middle of the vault of heaven), or culmen aereum (of the æther separating the strata of air above); the summit of the stars rising up into the extremest spheres is intended (we should say: the fixed stars, or to use a still more modern expression, the milky way), as also the רָמוֹ favours our taking רֹאשׁ כּוֹכָבִים as one notion (summitas astrorum = summa astra).

The connection of what follows with Waw is not adversative (Hirz., Ew., and others: and yet thou speakest), it is rather consecutive (Hahn: and since thou speakest; better: and in consequence of this thou speakest; or: thus speakest thou, thinkest thou then). The undeniable truth that God is exalted, and indeed absolute in His exaltation, is misapplied by Job to the false conclusion: what does God know, or (since the perf. in interrogative sentences frequently corresponds to the Latin conjunctive, vid. on Ps. xi. 3) how should God know, or take knowledge, i.e. of anything that happens on earth? In ver. 13^b the potential takes the place of this modal perfect: can He rule judicially behind the dark clouds, i.e. over the world below from which He is shut out? בָּעֵר (of like verbal origin with the Arab. بَعَدَ, post, prop. distance, separation, succession, but of wider use) signifies here, as in ch. i. 10, ix. 7, behind, pone, with the secondary notion of being encompassed or covered by that which shuts off. Far from having an unlimited view of everything earthly from His absolute height, it is veiled from Him by the clouds, so that He sees not what occurs here below, and unconcerned about it He walks the circle of the heavens (that which vaults the earth, the inhabitants of which seem to Him, according to Isa. xl. 22, as grasshoppers); הִתְהַלֵּךְ is here, after the analogy of Kal, joined with the accus. of the way over which He walks at His pleasure: orbem cælum obambulat. By such unworthy views of the Deity, Job puts himself on a par with the godless race that was swept away by the flood in ancient days, without allowing himself to be warned by this example of punishment.

- 15 *Wilt thou observe the way of the ancient world,
Which evil men have trodden,*
- 16 *Who were withered up before their time,
Their foundation was poured out as a stream,*
- 17 *Who said unto God: Depart from us!
And what can the Almighty do to them?*
- 18 *And notwithstanding He had filled their houses with good—
The counsel of the wicked be far from me!*

While in Ps. cxxxix. 24 דֶּרֶךְ עוֹלָם prospectively signifies a way of eternal duration (comp. Ezek. xxvi. 20, עַם עוֹלָם, of the people who sleep the interminably long sleep of the grave),

אֲרָחָם עוֹלָם signifies here retrospectively the way of the ancient world, but not, as in Jer. vi. 16, xviii. 15, the way of thinking and acting of the pious forefathers which put their posterity to shame, but of a godless race of the ancient world which stands out as a terrible example to posterity. Eliphaz asks if Job will observe, i.e. keep (שָׁמַר as in Ps. xviii. 22), this way trodden by people (מַתִּי, comp. אֲנִישִׁי, ch. xxxiv. 36) of wickedness. Those worthless ones were withered up, i.e. forcibly seized and crushed, וְלֹא-עַתָּה, when it was not yet time (לֹא after the manner of a circumstantial clause: quum nondum, as Ps. cxxxix. 16), i.e. when according to God's creative order their time was not yet come. On קָמְטוּ¹ vid. on ch. xvi. 8; LXX. correctly, συνελήφθησαν ἄωροι, nevertheless συλλαμβάνειν is too feeble as a translation of קָמַט; for as قَبَضَ signifies to take with the tip of the finger, whereas قَبَضَ signifies to take with the whole bent hand, so קָמַט, in conformity to the dull, emphatic final consonant, signifies "to bind firmly together." In ver. 16b יִצַּק is not perf. Pual for יִצַּק (Ew. § 83, b), for this exchange, contrary to the character of the form, of the sharp form with the lengthened form is without example; it must at least have been written יִצַּק (comp. Judg. xviii. 29). It is fut. Hoph., which, according to ch. xi. 15, might be יִצַּק; here, however, it is with a resolving, not assimilation, of the Jod, as in Lev. xxi. 10. The fut. has the signification of the imperfect which it acquires in an historic connection. It is not to be translated: their place became a stream which has flowed away (Hirz.), for the הָיָה which would be required by such an interpretation could not be omitted; also not: flumen effusum est in fundamentum eorum (Rosenm., Hahn, and others), which would be לִיסוּדָם, and would still be very liable to be misunderstood; also not: whose foundation was a poured-out stream (Umbr., Olsh.), for then there would be one attributive clause inserted in the other; but: their solid ground became fluid like a stream (Ew., Hlgst., Schlottm.), so that נָהָר, after the analogy of the verbs with two accusatives, Ges. § 139, 2, is a so-called second acc. of the obj. which by the passive becomes a nominative (comp. ch. xxviii. 2), although it might also be an apposition of the following subj. placed first: a stream (as such, like such a one) their solid ground was brought into a river; the ground on which they and their habitations stood was placed under water and floated away: without doubt the flood is intended; reference to this perfectly accords with the patriarchal pre- and extra-Israelitish standpoint of the book of Job; and the generation of the time of the flood (דור המבול) is accounted in the holy scriptures of the Old and New Testament as a paragon of godlessness, the contemporaries of Noah are the ἀπειθοῦντες, סוררים, κατ' ἐξοχήν (comp. 1 Pet. iii. 20 with Ps. lxxviii. 19).

Accordingly they are now here also further described (ver. 17) as those who said to God, "Depart from us," and what could the Almighty do to them (לָמוֹ instead of לָנוּ, which was to be expected, since, as in ch. xix. 28, there is a change from the oratio directa to obliqua)! Olshausen explains with Hahn: "with respect to whom thou sayest: and what then does the Almighty do to them (for it)? He fills their houses with prosperity, while the counsel of the wicked is far from me (notwithstanding I am unfortunate)." But this explanation is as forced (since ומה without a אמרה or תאמר standing with it is taken as the word of Job) as it is contrary to the syntax (since the circumstantial clause with והוא is not recognised, and on the other hand וַעֲצָה וְגו', instead of which it ought at least to have been וַיִּמְנֵי וְגו', is regarded as such an one). No indeed, just this is an exceedingly powerful effect, that Eliphaz describes those godless ones who dismiss God with סור ממנו, to whom, according to Job's assertion, ch. xxi. 12 sq., undimmed prosperity is portioned out, by referring to a memorable fact as that which has fallen under the strict judgment of God; and that with the very same words with which Job, ch. xxi. 16, declines communion with such prosperous evil-doers: "the counsel of the wicked be far from me," he will have nothing more to do, not with the wicked alone, but, with a side glance at Job, even with those who place themselves on a level with them by a denial of the just government of God in the world. לֹא יִעֲזָב, as the following circumstantial clause shows, is intended like Ps. lxxviii. 29, comp. xxxi. 20, Isa. xxvi. 12: how can the Almighty then help or profit them? Thus they asked, while He had filled their houses with wealth—Eliphaz will have nothing to do with this contemptible misconstruction of the God who proves himself so kind to those who dwell below on the earth, but who, though He is rewarded with ingratitude, is so just. The truly godly are not terrified like Job, ch. xvii. 8, that retributive justice is not to be found in God's government of the world; on the contrary, they rejoice over its actual manifestation in their own case, which makes them free, and therefore so joyous.

19 The righteous see it and rejoice,

And the innocent mock at them:

20 "Verily our opponent is destroyed,

And the fire hath devoured their abundance."

This thought corresponds to that expressed as a wish, hope, or anticipation at the close of many of the Psalms, that the retributive justice of God, though we may have to wait a long time for it, becomes at length the more gloriously manifest to the joy of those hitherto innocently persecuted, Ps. lxxviii. 11 sq. The obj. of יִרְאֵה, as in Ps. cvii. 42, is this its manifestation. לֹא is not an ethical dative, as in Ps. lxxx. 7, but as in Ps. ii. 4 refers to the ungodly whose mocking pride comes to such an ignominious end. What follow in ver. 20 are the words of the godly; the introductory לֵאמֹר is wanting, as e.g. Ps. ii. 3. אִם-לֹא can signify neither si non, as ch. ix. 24, xxiv. 25, xxxi. 31, nor annon, as in a disjunctive question, ch. xvii. 2, xxx. 25; it is affirmative, as ch. i. 11, ii. 5, xxxi. 36—an Amen to God's peremptory judgment. On נִכְחַד (he is drawn away, put aside, become annulled), vid. supra, p. 282. קִימְנוּ (for which Aben-Ezra is also acquainted with the reading קִימְנוּ with קָמַן קָמַן, i.e. צִירִי) has a pausal á springing from é, as ch. xx. 27, מִתְקַוֶּמָּה for מִתְקַוֶּמָּה; Ruth iii. 2, מִוֹרַעְתָּנוּ; Isa. xlvi. 10, רִאֲצִי (together with the reading רִאֲצִי, comp. 1 Chron. xii. 17, לְרִמּוֹתַי). The correction קָמִינוּ is unnecessary: the form קִים is softened from קִים, as עִיר (city) from עִיר, etc. (compare note on ch. xxiv. 12). יְתָרָם is no more to be translated their remnant (Hirz.) here than in Ps. xvii. 14, at least not in the sense of Ex. xxiii. 11; that which exceeds the necessity is intended, their surplus, their riches. It is said of Job in b. Megilla, 28a: אִיּוֹב וַתֵּרֶן בְּמִמּוֹנֶיהָ הוּא, he was extravagant (prodigus) with his property. The fire devouring the wealth of the godless is an allusion to the misfortune which has befallen him.

After this terrible picture, Eliphaz turns to the exhortation of him who may be now perhaps become ripe for repentance.

- 21 *Make friends now with Him, so hast thou peace ;
Thereby good will come unto thee.*
- 22 *Receive now teaching from His mouth,
And place His utterances in thy heart.*
- 23 *If thou returnest to the Almighty, thou shalt be built up again ;
If thou puttest away iniquity far from thy tents.*
- 24 *And lay by in the dust the gold ore,
And under the pebbles of the brooks the gold of Ophir.*

25 So shall the Almighty be to thee gold ore in abundance,

And silver to thee of the brightest lustre.

The relationship of the verbs סָבַן, שָׁבַן, and סָכַן, has been already discussed on ver. 2: the Hiph. signifies to be on friendly terms with any one; to enter into, or to stand in, an intimate relationship to any one (Ps. cxxxix. 3); then also (as the Greek φιλεῖν) to get accustomed to, to be used to (Num. xxii. 30). The second imper. is consecutive, as e.g.

Prov. iii. 4: and have as the result of it peace (Arab. ^{صلى}فاسلم) = so shalt thou have peace, Ges. § 130, 2. In ver. 21 the first thing to be done is to clear up the form תְּבוֹאֲתֶךָ or (according to another reading which is likewise well attested) תְּבוֹאֲתֶךָ. Olshausen (in Hirz. and in his Gramm.) and Rödiger (in Thes. p. 11, suppl.) explain this form the same as the other forms which come under consideration in connection with it, viz. תְּבוֹאֲתָהּ (veniat), Deut. xxxiii. 16, and וְתִבְאֲתִי, Keri וְתִבְאֲתִי (et venisses, addressed to Abigail), 1 Sam. xxv. 34, as errors in writing; whereas Ew., § 191, c, sees in תְּבוֹאֲתֶךָ the form תְּבוֹאֲתָהּ = תְּבוֹאָה furnished with a superfluous feminine termination, in תְּבוֹאֲתָהּ an extension of the double feminine by the unaccented ah of intention, and in תִּבְאֲתִי a transfer of the inflexion of the perf. to the fut. Confining ourselves to the form which occurs here, we refer to what was said above, p. 187, note 2: תְּבוֹאֲתֶךָ is not a forma mixta from תְּבוֹאֲתֶךָ and בָּאֲתֶךָ, but the double feminine תְּבוֹאֲתָהּ furnished with suff., the ah of which, although the tone is on the penult., is not He voluntativum, as Isa. v. 19, but He femin. The exception of such double feminines is made as certain in Hebrew by the regular form נִגְלָתָהּ (= נִגְלָתָהּ with a second feminine termination), and by examples like Prov. i. 20, Ezek. xxiii. 20, and also Josh. vi. 17, 2 Sam. i. 26, Amos iv. 3 (comp. even Olsh. in his Gramm. S. 449), as the double plural and its further formation by a feminine termination in Arabic. It is therefore unnecessary, with Olsh. and Röd., after the precedent of the ancient versions, to read תְּבוֹאֲתָךְ (which is found in 19 Codd. in de Rossi): proventus tuus bonus erit. The suff. in בָּרֶךְ, as Isa. lxiv. 4, Ezek. xxxiii. 18, comp. עֲלֵיהֶם, Isa. xxxviii. 16, is intended as neuter, as the fem. is used elsewhere (e.g. Isa. xxxviii. 16, בָּרֶךְ): by it, i.e. by such conduct, good (prosperity) shall come to thee, and indeed, as the בּוֹא construed with the acc. implies, in a sudden change of thy previous lot, coming about without any further effort on thy part. In the certainty that it is God's word which he presents to his friend (the very certainty which Eliphaz also expresses elsewhere, e.g. ch. xv. 11), he further admonishes him (ver. 22) to receive instruction from God's mouth (מִפִּי as Prov. ii. 6), and to allow His (God's) utterances a place in his heart, not to let them die away without effect, but to imprint them deeply on his mind.

Ver. 23. If he return to the Almighty (שׁוּב עַד as freq., e.g. Isa. xix. 22, comp. xlv. 24, instead of the otherwise usual שׁוּב אֵל, of thorough and complete conversion), he will be built up again, by his former prosperity being again raised from its ruins. בָּנָה, to build, always according to the connection, has at one time the idea of building round about, continuing to build, or finishing building (vid. on ch. xx. 19); at another of building up again (ch. xii. 14; Isa. lviii. 12), referred to persons, the idea of increasing prosperity (Mal. iii. 15), or of the restoration of ruined prosperity (Jer. xxiv 6, xxxiii. 7), here in the latter sense. The promissory תְּבִנָּה is surrounded by conditional clauses, for ver. 23b (comp. ch. xi. 14) is a second conditional clause still under the government of אִם, which is added for embellishment; it opens the statement of that in which penitence must be manifested, if it is to be thorough. The LXX. translates εἰν δὲ ἐπιστραφῆς καὶ ταπεινώσης, i.e. תַּעֲנֶה, which Ewald considers as the original; the omission of the אִם (which the poet otherwise in such connections has formerly heaped up, e.g. ch. viii. 5 sq., xi. 13 sq.) is certainly inconvenient. And yet we should not on that account like to give up the figure indicated in תַּבְנֶה, which is so beautiful and so suited to our poet. The statement advanced in the latter conditional clause is then continued in ver. 24 in an independent imperative clause, which the old versions regard as a promise instead of exhortation, and therefore grossly misinterpret. The Targ. translates: and place on the dust a strong city (i.e. thou shalt then, where there is now nothing but dust, raise up such), as if בָּצָר could be equivalent to בְּצֻרִין or מְבָצָר,—a rendering to which Saadia at least gives a turn which accords with the connection: “regard the stronghold (الْحَصْن) as dust, and account as the stones of the valleys the gold of Ophir;” better than Eichhorn: “pull down thy stronghold of violence, and demolish (הפיר) the castles of thy valleys.” On the other hand, Gecatilia, who understands בָּצָר proportionately more correctly of treasures, translates it as a promise: so shalt thou inherit treasures (دخاير) more numerous than dust, and gold ore (تبر) (more than) the stones of the valleys; and again also Rosenm. (repones præ pulvere argentum) and Welte interpret ver. 24 as a promise; whereas other expositors, who are true to the imperative נִשִּׂית, explain נִשִּׂית æstimare, and על-עפר pulveris instar (Grot., Cocc., Schult., Dathe, Umbr.), by falsely assigning to על here, as to ל elsewhere, a meaning which it never has anywhere; how blind, on the other hand, since the words in their first meaning, pone super pulverem, furnish an excellent thought which is closely connected with the admonition to rid one’s self of unjust possessions. בָּצָר, like תֵּבֶר (by which Abulwalid explains it), is gold and silver ore, i.e. gold and silver as they are broken out of the mine, there fore (since silver is partially pure, gold almost pure, and always containing more or less silver) the most precious metal in its pure natural state before being worked, and consequently also unalloyed (comp. نَصِير and نَصَار, which likewise signifies aurum argentumve nativum, but not ab excidendo, but a nitore); and “to lay in the dust” is equivalent to, to part with a thing as entirely worthless and devoid of attraction. The meaning is therefore: put away from thee the idol of precious metal with contempt (comp. Isa. ii. 20), which is only somewhat differently expressed in the parallel: lay the Ophir under the quartz (יִבְצֹר agreeing with בְּצֹר) of the brooks (such as is found in the beds of empty wâdys), i.e. place it under the rubble, after it has lost for thee its previous bewitching spell. As cloth woven from the filaments of the nettle is called muslin, from Mossul, and cloth with figures on it “damask, דָּמֶשֶׁק” (Amos iii. 12), from Damascus,¹ and aloes-wood مَنْدَل, from Coromandel; so the gold from Ophir, i.e. from the coast of the Abhîra, on the north coast of the Runn (Old Indian Irina, i.e. Salt Sea), east of the mouth of the Indus,² is directly called אופיר. When Job thus casts from him temporal things, by the excessive cherishing of which he has hitherto sinned, then God himself will be his imperishable treasure, his everlasting higher delight. He frees himself from temporal בְּצֹר; and the Almighty, therefore the absolute personality of God himself, will be to him instead of it בְּצֹרִים, gold as from the mine, in rich abundance. This is what the contrast of the plur. (בְּצֶרֶךְ without Jod plur. is a false reading) with the sing. implies; the LXX., Syriac version, Jerome, and Arabic version err here, since they take the בְּ of בְּצֶרֶךְ as a preposition.

² Thus אופיר has been explained by Lassen in his pamphlet de Penapotamia, and his Indische Alterthumskunde (i. 539). The LXX. (Cod. Val.) and Theodot. have Σοφείρ, whence Ges. connects Ophir with Arrian's Οὔππαρα and Edrisi's Sufâra in Guzerat, especially since Sofir is attested as the Coptic name for India. The matter is still not settled.

The ancient versions and lexicographers furnish no explanation of הוֹעֲפוֹת. The Targ. translates it הִתְקוֹף רוּמָא, and accordingly it is explained by both חֵזֶק (strength) and גְּבוּהָ (height), without any reason being assigned for these significations. In the passage before us the LXX. transl. ἀργύριον πεπυρωμένον from עָר, in the Targum signification to blow, forge; the Syriac version, argentum computationum (הוֹשְׁבֵנִין), from עָר in the Targum-Talmudic signification to double (= Hebr. כָּפַל). According to the usage of the language as we know it, יָעַר, from the Hiph. of which הוֹעֲפוֹת is formed, signifies to become feeble, to be wearied; but even if, starting from the primary notion, an available signification is attained for the passage before us (fatigues = toilsome excitement, synon. יָיַע) and Ps. xcv. 4 (climbings = heights), the use of the word in the most ancient passages citable, Num. xxiii. 22, xxiv. 8, בְּהוֹעֲפַת רִאִים לוֹ, still remains unexplained; for here the notion of being incapable of fatigue, invincibility, or another of the like kind, is required, without any means at hand for rightly deriving it from יָעַר, to become feeble, especially as the radical signification anhelare supposed by Gesenius (comp. אָן from the root אָן) is unattested. Accordingly, we must go back to the root רוּף, רָף, discussed on Ps. xcv. 4, which signifies to rise aloft, to be high, and from which יָפַע, or with a transposition of the consonants יָעַר (comp. עָיַר and יָעַר), acquires the signification of standing out, rising radiantly, shining afar off, since יָעַר, to become weary, is allied to the Arab. وَغَف, fut. i; this יָעַר (יָפַע), on the other hand, to يَفِيع, ascendere, adolescere, وَفِع, elatum, adultum esse, and وَفَى, eminere, and tropically completum, perfectum esse. Thus we obtain the signification eminentiae for הוֹעֲפוֹת. In Ps. xcv. 4, as a numerical plur., it signifies the towerings (tops) of the mountains, and here, as in the passages cited from Numbers, either prominent, eminent attributes, or as an intensive plur. excellence; whence, agreeing with Ewald, we have translated "silver of the brightest lustre" (comp. יָפֶה, eminentia, splendor, Ezek. xxviii. 7).

- 26 *For then thou shalt delight thyself in the Almighty,
And lift up thy countenance to Eloah;*
27 *If thou prayest to Him, He will hear thee,
And thou shalt pay thy vows.*
28 *And thou devisest a plan, and it shall be established to thee,
And light shineth upon thy ways.*
29 *If they are cast down, thou sayest, "Arise!"
And him that hath low eyes He saveth.*
30 *He shall rescue him who is not guiltless,
And he is rescued by the purity of thy hands.*

כִּי־אָז might also be translated "then indeed" (vid. on ch. xi. 15), as an emphatic resumption of the promissory וְהָיָה (tum erit), ver. 25; but what follows is really the confirmation of the promise that God will be to him a rich recompense for the earthly treasures that he resigns; therefore: for then thou shalt delight thyself in the Almighty (vid. the primary passage, Ps. xxxvii. 4, and the dependent one, Isa. lviii. 14; comp. infra, ch. xxvii. 10), i.e. He will become a source of highest, heartfelt joy to thee (עַל just as interchanging with בְּ by שָׂמַח). Then shall he be able to raise his countenance, which was previously depressed (נִפְּלִי, Gen. iv. 6 sq.), in the consciousness of his estrangement from God by dearly cherished sin and unexpiated guilt, free and open, confident and joyous, to God. If he prays to Him (וְהִתְעַתִּיר may be thus regarded as the antecedent of a conditional clause, like יִבְרָא, ch. xx. 24), He will hear him; and what he has vowed in prayer he will now, after that which he sup-plicated is granted, thankfully perform; the Hiph. הִעֲתִיר (according to its etymon: to offer the incense of prayer) occurs only in Ex. viii.-x. beside this passage, whereas נָזַר (to cut in pieces, cut off) occurs here for the first time in the signification, to decide, resolve, which is the usual meaning of the word in the later period of the language. On וְהִנֵּיר (with Pathach, according to another reading with Kametz-chatuph), vid. Ges. § 47, rem. 2. Moreover, the paratactic clauses of ver. 28 are to be arranged as we have translated them; קִים signifies to come to pass, as freq. (e.g. Isa. vii. 7, in connection with הָיָה, to come into being). That which he designs (אָמַר) is successful, and is realized, and light shines upon his ways, so that he cannot stumble and does not miss his aim,—light like moonlight or morning light; for, as the author of the introductory Proverbs, to which we have already so often referred as being borrowed from the book of Job (comp. ch. xxi. 24 with Prov. iii. 8), ingeniously says, ch. iv. 18: “The path of the righteous is as the morning light (בְּאוֹר נֹהָר), comp. Dan. vi. 20), which shineth brighter and brighter unto the height of day (i.e. noonday brightness).”

Ver. 29. הִשְׁפִּילָם refers to הִרְבֵּיךָ; for if it is translated: in case they lower (Schlottm., Renan, and others), the suff. is wanting, and the thought is halting. As הִשְׁפִּיל signifies to make low, it can also signify to go down (Jer. xiii. 18), and said of ways, “to lead downwards” (Rosenm., Ew., Hahn). The old expositors go altogether astray in ver. 29a, because they did not discern the exclamative idea of גָּוָה. The noun גָּוָה—which is formed from the verb גָּוָה = גָּאָה, as גָּאָה, arrogance, Prov. viii. 13; גָּוָה, healing, Prov. xvii. 22; גָּוָה, mitigation, Nah. iii. 19 (distinct from גָּוָה, the body, the fem. of גָּו), without the necessity of regarding it as syncopated from גָּאָה (Olsh. § 154, b), as שָׁלָה, 1 Sam. i. 17, from שִׁאֲלָה—does not here signify pride or haughtiness, as in ch. xxxiii. 17, Jer. xiii. 17, but signifies adverbially sursum (therefore synon. of מָלָה, which, being formed from מָל, elevatio, with He of direction and Dag. forte implic., as מַרְרָה, מַרְרָנָה = paddannah, harrah,—perhaps, however, it is to be read directly מָלָה, with He fem.,—is likewise a substantive made directly into an adverb, like מִנִּיָּה: suppose that (מִי = éav, as מִי = ei) thy ways lead downwards, thou sayest: on high! i.e. thy will being mighty in God, thy confidence derived from the Almighty, will all at once give them another and more favourable direction: God will again place in a condition of prosperity and happiness,—which יִשְׁעֵי (defectively written; LXX.: σώσει; Jer. and Syr., however, reading יִשְׁעֵי: salvabitur), according to its etymon, Arab. عَجَزَ, signifies,—him who has downcast eyes (LXX. κύφοντα ὀφθαλμοῖς).

Ver. 30. It may seem at first sight, that by יִשְׁעֵי, the not-guiltless (יִשְׁעֵי¹ = יִשְׁעֵי = יִשְׁעֵי, e.g. Isa. xl. 29, 2 Chron. xiv. 10, Ges. § 152, 1), Eliphaz means Job himself in his present condition; it would then be a mild periphrastic expression for “the guilty, who has merited his suffering.” If thou returnest in this manner to God, He will—this would be the idea of ver. 30*a*—free thee, although thy suffering is not undeserved. Instead now of proceeding: and thou shalt be rescued on account of the purity of thy hands, i.e. because thou hast cleansed them from wrong, Eliphaz would say: and this not-guiltless one will be rescued, i.e. thou, the not-guiltless, wilt be rescued, by the purity of thy hands. But one feels at once how harsh this synallage would be. Even Hirzel, who refers ver. 30*a* to Job, refers 30*b* to some one else. In reality, however, another is intended in both cases (Ew., Schlottm., Hahn, Olsh.); and ver. 30*a* is just so arranged as to be supplemented by בְּבִרְיָהּ, ver. 30*b*. Even old expositors, as Seb. Schmid and J. H. Michaelis, have correctly perceived the relation: liberabit Deus et propter puritatem manuum tuarum alios, quos propria innocentia ipsos deficiens non esset liberatura. The purity of the hands (Ps. xviii. 21) is that which Job will have attained when he has put from him that which defiles him (comp. ch. ix. 30 with xvii. 9). Hirzel has referred to Matt. vi. 33 in connection with vers. 24 sq.; one is here reminded of the words of our Lord to Peter, Luke xxii. 32: σύ ποτέ ἐπιστρέψας στήριξον τοὺς ἀδελφούς σου. Eliphaz, although unconsciously, in these last words expresses prophetically what will be fulfilled in the issue of the history in Job himself.

The speech of Eliphaz opens the third course of the controversy. In the first course of the controversy the speeches of the friends, though bearing upon the question of punishment, were embellished with alluring promises; but these promises were incapable of comforting Job, because they proceeded upon the assumption that he is suffering as a sinner deserving of punishment, and can only become free from his punishment by turning to God. In the second course of the controversy, since Job gave no heed to their exhortations to penitence, the friends drew back their promises, and began the more unreservedly to punish and to threaten, by presenting to Job, in the most terrifying pictures of the ruin of the evil-doer, his own threatening destruction. The misconstruction which Job experiences from the friends has the salutary effect on him of rooting him still more deeply in the hope that God will not let him die without having borne witness to his innocence. But the mystery of the present is nevertheless not cleared up for Job by this glimpse of faith into the future. On the contrary, the second course of the controversy ends so, that to the friends who unjustly and uncharitably deny instead of solving the mystery of his individual lot, Job now presents that which is mysterious in the divine distribution of human fortune in general, the total irreconcilableness of experience with the idea of the just divine retribution maintained by them. In that speech of his, ch. xxi., which forms the transition to the third course of the controversy, Job uses the language of the doubter not without sinning against God. But since it is true that the outward lot of man by no means always corresponds to his true moral condition, and never warrants an infallible conclusion respecting it, he certainly in that speech gives the death-blow to the dogma of the friends. The poet cannot possibly allow them to be silent over it. Eliphaz, the most discreet and intelligent, speaks. His speech, considered in itself, is the purest truth, uttered in the most appropriate and beautiful form. But as an answer to the speech of Job the dogma of the friends itself is destroyed in it, by the false conclusion by which it is obliged to justify itself to itself. The greatness of the poet is manifest from this, that he makes the speeches of the friends, considered in themselves, and apart from the connection of the drama, express the most glorious truths, while they are proved to be inadequate, indeed perverted and false, in so far as they are designed to solve the existing mystery. According to their general substance, these speeches are genuine diamonds; according to their special application, they are false ones.

How true is what Eliphaz says, that God neither blesses the pious because he is profitable to Him, nor punishes the wicked because he is hurtful to Him; that the pious is profitable not to God, but to himself; the wicked is hurtful not to God, but himself; that therefore the conduct of God towards both is neither arbitrary nor selfish! But if we consider the conclusion to which, in these thoughts, Eliphaz only takes a spring, they prove themselves to be only the premises of a false conclusion. For Eliphaz infers from them that God rewards virtue as such, and punishes vice as such ; that therefore where a man suffers, the reason of it is not to be sought in any secondary purpose on the part of God, but solely and absolutely in the purpose of God to punish the sins of the man. The fallacy of the conclusion is this, that the possibility of any other purpose, which is just as far removed from self-interest, in connection with God's purpose of punishing the sins of the man, is excluded. It is now manifest how near theoretical error and practical falsehood border on one another, so that dogmatical error is really in the rule at the same time ἀδικία. For after Eliphaz, in order to defend the justice of divine retribution against Job, has again indissolubly connected suffering and the punishment of sin, without acknowledging any other form of divine rule but His justice, any other purpose in decreeing suffering than the infliction of punishment (from the recognition of which the right and true comfort for Job would have sprung up), he is obliged in the present instance, against his better knowledge and conscience, to distort an established fact, to play the hypocrite to himself, and persuade himself of the existence of sins in Job, of which the confirmation fails him, and to become false and unjust towards Job even in favour of the false dogma. For the dogma demands wickedness in an equal degree to correspond to a great evil, unlimited sins to unlimited sufferings. Therefore the former wealth of Job must furnish him with the ground of heavy accusations, which he now expresses directly and unconditionally to Job. He whose conscience, however, does not accuse him of mammon-worship, ch. xxxi. 24 sq., is suffering the punishment of a covetous and compassionless rich man. Thus is the dogma of the justice of God rescued by the unjust abandonment of Job.

Further, how true is Eliphaz' condemnatory judgment against the free-thinking, which, if it does not deny the existence of God, still regards God as shut up in the heavens without concerning himself about anything that takes place on earth! The divine judgment of total destruction came upon a former generation that had thought thus insolently of God, and to the joy of the righteous the same judgment is still executed upon evil-doers of the same mind. This is true, but it does not apply to Job, for whom it is intended. Job has denied the universality of a just divine retribution, but not the special providence of God. Eliphaz sets retributive justice and special providence again here in a false correlation. He thinks that, so far as a man fails to perceive the one, he must at once doubt the other,—another instance of the absurd reasoning of their dogmatic one-sidedness. Such is Job's relation to God, that even if he failed to discover a single trace of retributive justice anywhere, he would not deny His rule in nature and among men. For his God is not a mere notion, but a person to whom he stands in a living relation. A notion falls to pieces as soon as it is found to be self-contradictory; but God remains what He is, however much the phenomenon of His rule contradicts the nature of His person. The rule of God on earth Job firmly holds, although in manifold instances he can only explain it by God's absolute and arbitrary power. Thus he really knows no higher motive in God to which to refer his affliction; but nevertheless he knows that God interests himself about him, and that He who is even now his Witness in heaven will soon arise on the dust of the grave in his behalf. For such utterances of Job's faith Eliphaz has no ear. He knows no faith beyond the circle of his dogma.

The exhortations and promises by which Eliphaz then (ch. xxii. 21-30) seeks to lead Job back to God are in and of themselves true and most glorious. There is also somewhat in them which reflects shame on Job; they direct him to that inward peace, to that joy in God, which he had entirely lost sight of when he spoke of the misfortune of the righteous in contrast with the prosperity of the wicked.¹ But even these beauteous words of promise are blemished by the false assumption from which they proceed. The promise, the Almighty shall become Job's precious ore, rests on the assumption that Job is now suffering the punishment of his avarice, and has as its antecedent: "Lay thine ore in the dust, and thine Ophir beneath the pebbles of the brook." Thus do even the holiest and truest words lose their value when they are not uttered at the right time, and the most brilliant sermon that exhorts to penitence remains without effect when it is prompted by pharisaic uncharitableness. The poet, who in general has regarded the character of Eliphaz as similar to that of a prophet (vid. ch. iv. 12 sqq.), makes him here at the close of his speech against his will prophesy the issue of this controversy. He who now, considering himself as נָקִי, preaches penitence to Job, shall at last stand forth as נָקִי אֱלֹהִים, and will be one of the first who need Job's intercession as the servant of God, and whom he is able mediatorially to rescue by the purity of his hands.
